Democrats Hope To Balance Budget By Slashing Expenditures Rather Than Increase Federal Tax Burden

Stewart Gives Probable Course In Face of Elections

(Editor's Note: This is the first of a series of news dispatches on the tax and appropriation problem in congress.)

By CHARLES F. STEWART, Central Press Staff Writer. Washington, Jan. 27.—With his expenses around a billion annually more than his yearly income, Uncle Sam obviously must retrench drastically, increase taxes until it hurts like sixty, adopt a middle course involving both expenditures or go on the financial rocks in the mighty near future.

He will adopt a middle course; that already virtually is settled. The house of representatives (in which all fiscal legislation must originate) is deciding now on what new taxes to pile on. The appropriations committee is wrestling with the problem of a general cut in expenses.

The ways and means committee has before it Secretary of the Treasury Mellon's suggestions outlining the sort of taxation program he favors.

The committee is not likely to keep it very closely.

The secretary naturally had more influence with the last congress, since it was strongly of his own Republican faith, than he has with this one, due to present Democratic dominance, though by a narrow margin.

Mr. Mellon wants a "broad taxation base"—that is, small collections from the maximum number of taxpayers. There is considerable sentiment among the Democratic legislators for a "soak the rich policy" from which, however, there are some notable Jeffersonian dissenters.

President Hoover has sketched a plan of economies which he urges the appropriations committee to put into effect.

It includes recommendations for drastic cuts in allowances to the various governmental departments, especially the war and navy departments, which are the most expensive on the list, anyway.

He also proposes a consolidation of many government activities, with a view to the elimination of duplications of effort. It is a scheme which undoubtedly will save an appreciable number of millions—not as many millions as if the activities the president wishes to consolidate were to be discontinued altogether, but quite a number of millions.

Democratic members of the appropriations committee are friendly enough to the Republican president's schedule of reductions, as far as it goes, but they do not think it goes far enough.

The Democrats' recently-acquired majority in the house of representatives and their near-majority in the senate have given them an acute sense of responsibility to the voters this winter—with a national election looming so close ahead.

If they do not have to harpoon the taxpayers too deeply, they are hopeful that it will be kindly remembered of them at the polls next November. Consequently the Democratic disposition is to balance the budget by a minimum advance in imposts and a maximum slashing of federal expenditures for the coming year.

No Democrat I have met has been willing even to discuss a slash of less than $150,000,000. Senator Pat Harrison of Mississippi has demanded a slash of $300,000,000. Senator William H. King of Utah has stated that it must reach at least $500,000,000.

Of course every taxpayer is bound to hope that Senator King is not insisting on the impossible, because the deeper the slash in appropriations for the 1932-3 fiscal twelvemonth, the less Uncle Sam will be compelled to exact in increased taxation.

But is $500,000,000 impossible? This question I took, for reasons to be explained later, to Representative Louis Ludlow of Indianapolis.

"Well," said Ludlow, "Senator Aldrich, the foremost authority of his time on the subject, used to say that the government, run on business principles, could save $300,000,000 a year.

"It was spending a billion dollars then. In a decade and a half the total has shot up to more than five billions—from $11 per capita to $38 per capita. If $300,000,000 could have been saved out of a billion, it would seem as if $500,000,000 could be saved out of more than five times that much, wouldn't it?" (Another Dispatch Tomorrow.)

Board Ruling Is Made To Protect School Teachers

collecting," said LeRoy Martin, secretary of the board. "It is also hoped that this ruling on the part of the board will make some of the districts and counties realize that the State Treasury does not have an inexhaustible supply of cash, but that it is just as difficult for the State to collect the money it gives to the schools as it is for the counties to collect it."

This ruling on the part of the board is not expected to cause the closing of many schools that have been operating an extended term, since it is believed that now more of an effort will be made in these counties and districts to collect the taxes levied for the extended term. There will probably be a few districts in which conditions are such as to make the collection of the extended term taxes difficult, in which case the length of the extended term may have to be reduced. But in most cases it is expected that a majority of the schools will be kept open.

For several years the idea has been growing in many sections of the State that the State should not only support the constitutional six months school term without levying any local taxes on property, but that it should also pay the cost of the extended term. The growth of this idea has undoubtedly contributed to the practice in the past of using only the State money as far as it would go, and then let the matter rest.

Skeletons of gigantic animals were dug up in ancient days as well as today, and it is entirely possible that whereas the naturalist of today ascribes the remains to this or that animal, the people of the long ago naturally took these to be the remains of gigantic people of a giant race.
