Richard Bailey, movie director, is murdered in his home in Hollywood and Jere Kane, student of criminology, en route home to New Orleans from a vacation in Hawaii, stops off in Los Angeles to aid his old friend Ben MacQuarrie, a detective, and Chief of Police Lee, of Los Angeles, in solving the mystery. The room where Bailey was murdered shows signs of a terrific struggle but, con-trary to the beliefs of the others, Zane thinks that Bailey was killed without being given a chance. Among the pictures on Bailey's mantel is one of Nanette LeRoi, a rising star on the movie horizon, supposedly an importation from France. After leaving Bailey's house Kane meets her in the dining room of his hotel, discovers she is a woman he had known in New Orleans whom he had aided in clearing of a charge of murdering her husband. A facial operation has changed her completely. She is accompanied by Rodolf Holmes, an actor. They have dinner together, but Kane does not mention Bailey's death, seeking to surprise Nanette. He does by having the orchestra leader make the announcement pub Hely. Nanette pales and declares that ley deserved what he yot. She bells Kane that she had left Bailey's bungalow at 9 o'clock, the hour of the murder, and that he was all right at that time. She and Rodolf leave and Kane goes to police headquarters where Lillian Hull, Lucy Wilbur and Larry Weldon, all movie folk, are being questioned. They had been at Bailey's home discussing a new pic-ture shortly before the murder took story. They both declare that Nanette door.
