THE WORLD WAR DAY-BY-DAY Nov. 14, * 1914-After 12 days of fighting in snow, on procipitous slopes swept by machine gun fire, French Alpine troops captured the tete-de-Violu hill, commanding the Marieaux-Mines pass through the Vosges The summit was won only after handto-hand fighting with icy bayonets, and 600 Landwehr men lay dead in the last redoubt when it had been taken.

There are many volumes of heroic material in this struggle in the St. Die region, yet it was lost sight of at the time because of the struggle at Ypres. Fighting in the Vosges could not be decisive.

The work carried on by French and Germans along this natural frontier for 40 years had made it a military area in which it was impossible to move without encountering some nat ural or artificial obstruction. defended on one side or the other by num crous garrisons. It was there that hostilities between French and Germans actually started in August. After a few weeks the main offensives were halted: the defenses were such that a few thousand men could hold ! off whole divisions. Yet generals and the greatest British army in continued to sacrifice men foolishly listory.

> The generals who had had any actual experience in the art of warfare, of leading troops in the field before August 1914, were few. They began o fight the war in accordance with natequated ideas derived from Ameican War of the States, the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, the Boer War. Most had to learn their business as hey went along, at the cost of thousands of lives.

As the last German attacks before Tpres were failing, there died within he British lines in France the one 'ritish soldier who had foreseen what was now happening, whose words har een greeted by sneers, whose voice had almost been silenced by the feelsh optimism of the politicians. Fredrick. Lord Roberts, Britain's most vrilliant field commander, was 88 then the war began and too frail for tractical service. He did what he ould, he wisely tried to point the ay, but there were few who could isten. When he went to France a' be moment of crisis, to cheer his old ndian divisions, he contracted pneunonia and died on this date.

He was a phlianderer and wastrel until he was 80, when he settled down and married the wife with whom he lived, with occasion lapses from rectitude, for 32 years. Eight years after her death, when he was 120, he married again. This won him the attention of the Earl of Arundel, who took him to London to exhibit him to King Charles.

"You have lived longer than any other man." the king observed. "What have you done more than other men?" "I did penance when I was 100 years old," Parr replied with a sly cackle.

True, at 102 Parr was arrested. found guilty and punished for seduction of Catherine Milton, whom he married 18 years later. His son lived 113 years, his grandson 109 years, his gread-grandson 101 years!
