CICLY, BE GALL BY MARIE BLIZARD CHAPTER 31 he should not have seen it before. | when I was a little girl." He suffered for her, sensing those things, and for himself. She seemed Joan?" Julian hadn't meant to ask

JOAN LITERALLY stormed up the stairs to her own room after she sat down and thought about the brief conversation which she had manners. She felt humiliated by her own behavior which she did not analyze. Had she retraced her emotions, she would have saved herself much unhappiness that she was yet to face. For the moment she was too concerned with what she had done and not what she had thought. Like a little girl, she smoothed her frock, her hair and her ruffled composure and meekly took herself downstairs once more.

Julian was sitting before the hearth in the library.
"Mr. Sloane," she began timidly and penitently, "will you please forgive me? I.., I don't know what came over me. There isn't any reason for my doing anything so rude. I . . ."

"Come in, Joan. There isn't any reason for you to apologize. That married." was a most selfish remark for me to make. And I have been quite blind. You look very tired. You've been working under a strain all winter. That is entirely my fault. I have no right to expect that others are carried along on the wave of my own enthusiasm for work. It's going to be lighter now. Cream?"

Joan took her coffee and sipped it slewly without talking for a few min-She was struck anew with Julian's charm and tact. For a moment she was filled with peace. It flowed over her comfortingly in the fire-lit room, emphasized by the storm that had shaken her so short a time before. She felt wordless . . . still. Unseeing, and glad to be relieved of the maelstrom of the thoughts that had occupied her for so long, she gazed pensively into the leaping flames. Julian studied her and saw depths father, he questioned her gently. eneath the shadows in her eyes, in the pensive droop of her slighter figure. He read the growing maturity in the changing contour of her He saw sadness there and read, with a pang, the truth that Jean's maturity had come through sorrow. "Think?" Joan misread the sharp note in Julian's voice. Her nerves were on edge. Months of emotional strain had frayed them to a break ing point and she had never accepted the thought that Julian's interest might possibly be personal. Now when he repeated her word too quickly, she answered firmly:

"I meant that I am going to be "Alex?" He asked.
