

FURNITURE SHOULD HELP YOU RELAX

Every Room Needs a Spot Where Home Manager Can Rest Occasionally

Living, these days, is a complicated business. Most of us, we are all willing to admit at every opportunity, work too long and too hard. On top of that, most of us play too hard. To keep frayed nerves from going to pieces and to restore dispositions to something like normal, it's necessary to really relax when there's a chance. The principal time for relaxation is, of course, during the night hours. . . . and reams have been written about the need for comfortable bedding, especially good springs and mattresses, that will help restore the maximum amount of energy during the hours of repose. But there are odd moments, off and on during the whole day, when the housewife, if not her husband, can indulge "that tired feeling" . . . provided her home is properly furnished.

The "furnishings for lazy people" . . . and we all should be lazy occasionally. . . . are mostly little things, but people get along without them for years, forgetting how handy they are in relieving the strain of living every-day lives. They're energy-conservers far more necessary than many of the knick-knacks to be found in almost every home.

What About Kitchens?
Starting with the kitchen, where women spend most of their time, a check-up may reveal numerous deficiencies. For example, all kitchens have chairs, made to team up with standard height tables. . . . but the sink is usually higher. Is there a high stool on which you can perch while working at the sink? If so, you know what a relief it is to park on it and give tired feet a rest while peeling potatoes or doing other house-hold tasks. Most women seem to have an absolute horror of musing up a bed once it has been neatly made up for the day, and for that reason will forego excellent opportunities for stretching out and enjoying a breathing spell. That's where a chaise longue is a great addition to the bedroom furnishings, when there's room for one. It's always on the job, ready for those in-between moments. Incidentally, a good looking chaise helps make my bedroom distinctive.

Another point you shouldn't miss when checking up is wherever you keep your telephone. There are people, unbelievable as it sounds, who have to stand up while phoning simply because they've never gotten around to providing a comfortable spot in which to relax while ordering the groceries or discussing last week's party at the Joneses. A telephone stand and bench are a great help, although some of the benches, commonly sold for this purpose, rate pretty low as far as real comfort is concerned.

Comfort in Living Room.
The living room, in particular, should provide a comfortable chair for each member of the family. If the man of the house is built along generous lines, the absence of a big lounge chair should be grounds for divorce. There's nothing quite so funny—or so uncomfortable—as a big man in a dainty little chair that looks like it is almost ready to give up under the strain. At the same time there should be smaller chairs for mother, sister and the others. It's always a good idea to take members of the family along when shopping for chairs, so they can try out the particular model being considered. Rarely will two people agree on the relative comfort of two different chairs.

A bench in front of the radio earns its place in the home when some particular program is hard to find and minutes are spent twirling the dial. Comfortable dining room chairs make meals twice as enjoyable. . . . and if it takes a little more money to buy the dining room suite that has them, they're worth it. If there's a nursery in your home, furnished with juvenile furniture, there should be one adult-size chair included. . . . it makes sitting up with the baby much less of a hardship and chairs can be found to match the children's furnishings. Any home-maker can probably mention another half dozen places where "furniture for lazy people" is needed. The trick is to do something about it while the subject is fresh in mind.

WEAVES IN CARPETS MEET PERIOD STYLES

To keep your floor simple and rich in appearance, you need not choose an absolutely plain color fabric. The pebbly weave carpets and rugs, woven of curly twisted yarns, have just that slight uneven surface look that gives them texture interest. Then there are all sorts of new weaves and combinations that are brand new, yet are absolutely right with 18th Century or other traditional furniture types.

One-Motion Hinge

Czechoslovakia has contributed a new idea to the cabinet industry—a new one-motion hinge arrangement which permits opening and closing both doors in one motion. This new feature is found on many cabinets for the first time this fall.
