of Agriculture Henry Wallace said today if land destruction by erosion is to be prevented, "I see no alternative to the widespread adoption of land use practices that will prevent exces-sive run-offs and control soil losses." "Any other course is going to be much more expensive and probably much more expensive and probably disastrous in the long run," he said in an address before a gathering of thousands of farmers, farm specialists and other interested persons as a climax to his inspection of soil conservations projects in this vicinity.

"Erosion," he said, "is most severe in the Piedmont portion of the Statein this rolling country that slopes from the mountains to the coastal plains. The cabinet members said "according to the best available information" erosion was now removing on the average of the Piedmont "enough fertile soil to cut down the gross income crop yields at the rate of about 44 cents an acre each year. Throughout the Piedmont this reduced productivity means an average loss to farmers of around $1,628,000."
