Here's That Man--Leapin' Leo

LEO LONG-DUKE FULLBACK

The big gentleman running at you in the picture above is Leo Long, Duke's sporadic fullback who will be playing against the Red Raiders at Duke stadium Saturday afternoon. Johnny Long was star back at Colgate three seasons ago and because of a friendship brother Leo to Duke. Leo weighs 194 pounds and stands at inch above six feet. His home is in South Orange, N. J.

Duke's Long Had Brother Who Was Star At Colgate

Durham, Oct. 12.—There's a humorous interest story in the Duke-Colgate football battle which comes up in Duke stadium Saturday afternoon, and it centers around a big, black-haired fullback who will be playing for the Blue Devils.

Leo is very anxious to see action against Andy Kerr's power-laden Red Raiders. It seems he had a brother, Johnny Long—who was something of a backfield luminary at Colgate three seasons ago and now that the Long family has split its allegiance, Leo wants to uphold his end of the argument against his brother's old school.

Duke, Tigers Auto Accidents This Year Will Cost State $60,000,000

Richmond, Oct. 13.—(AP)—Clemson's defending champions and Duke's power line Devils, the only remaining undefeated teams in the 16-member Southern Conference, met on Saturday for their second year Wake Forest. In addition, the Duncans held a session over Tennessee.

It is $5,000,000 a month—about twice the sum the state collects from the gasoline tax—its biggest single tax item.

Yet there is no reason to doubt the correctness of the cost. Ronald Hootch, director of the state highway safety division, recently received from the National Safety Council a detailed discussion of the calculable cost of motor vehicle accidents, and it is on this scientific basis that the estimate of $60,000,000 was reached. Here's how it was reached:

Fear Family Scraps

Four family scraps are slated for Saturday, none involving the leaders. Virginia Tech goes to Davidson, Furman to N. C. State and Washington and Lee to Richmond.

NORTH HENDERSON TOPS S. HENDERSON

North Henderson defeated South Henderson last Wednesday afternoon 6 to 0 in a hard-fought football at the Community playgrounds in South Henderson. The score came in the second quarter when Ed Long lined up a pass from the 30 yards line to Doc Braswell, who scampered the remaining distance for the tally.

Unless there is a quiet and unexpected reversal of the current trend, North Carolina is certain to report a death toll for 1941 in excess of 1,700. What with oldsters maneuvering by the hundreds of thousands over a large part of the state, it is not at all impossible that this figure is much too low, rather than too high.

CHAPTER TWENTY-SIX

HALLIE KEPT a record in her diary of that summer in the Au-bergen place. Reading it, you'd say it was a good summer. Hallie put the good things into it. The other things she was trying to keep out of her busy, conscious mind, because they had to do with something dying in Eric's feeling for her and, as she saw it, dying, her own feeling grew and strengthened. She tried to pretend it was not so, that there was no change.

As said, it is more than the total cost of all the state's schools and roads.

Eric's train left each morning at 10. His broadcast was at noon, but there was a rehearsal at 11. Hallie was up at eight, lighting the heater so that Eric would have a hot bath, getting breakfast over the wood fire in the range, to save using the gas. On sunny days they had breakfast on a card table on the porch. When it was overcast and chilly—as it often was in the country—Hallie had a fire glowing in the living room hearth and the card table set up for their meal when Eric came down the stairs, whistling. He always whistled in the morning and it gave new heart to Hallie.

When he left, he gave her $50. "Eric says he's got a cool job next month. This'll help until then."

"We don't really need it," Hallie protested. "We get along beautifully. Daddy. The garden is full and we both love the things we get from it."

She wondered what they were going to do when the lettuce and tomatoes and cucumbers which were their main source of supplies were gone. She tried to preserve some of the tomatoes, but she was inexperienced and the adventure was a total loss.

It was Labor Day and then the summer was dying. Whatever job it was that Eric had told the doctor about, it was never mentioned by Eric to his wife. She suspected that it was a calamity for her father's benefit and forgave him.

Their third wedding anniversary came and went, unobserved. Hallie had bought a chicken for the occasion and put on a hostess gown that was three years old. Eric called from New York that he was staying in town with some of the gang.

Hallie wanted to throw the chicken and all the things that went with it into the wood fire over which she had cooked it, but experience had taught her that she could not afford such folly. She ate a great deal of the chicken herself, poured coffee into a demitasse and took it into the old drawing room where she sat before the fire and sipped it, smoking the one cigarette in the house.

With no small glee, she wrote a note and left it on the hall table. "There's the chicken in the ice box, but please don't eat it. We'll have it tomorrow night. I've left the dishes for you to wash."

"Love and kisses HALLIE." Eric ate a leg of the chicken and washed the dishes.

The next morning he said, "I'm going to write Win today. I haven't got a warm topcoat. But there's one that'll do in a trunk of mine I left home. When it comes, open it and air the stuff, will you?"

The trunk, an old-fashioned one, came four or five days later. Hallie couldn't find any keys to fit it, so she forced the lock with a screwdriver and threw back the lid.

There was a camphor odor that assailed her as she lifted out a suit folded on top of the other things. She shook it out, smiling. It wasn't a bad suit—or old-fashioned. She'd had an idea that the trunk had been locked since Eric's school days. She looked inside the pocket for the tailor's label. There it was—a date only four years old.

She put it down and was about to lift something else when she saw the packet of letters.

She took them out to lay them aside. Her glance carelessly passed over the packet. Then returned to it—and riveted!

They were letters—old, opened and read letters—and they were addressed to "Mrs. Eric Adams."
