Hack was the principal speaker at the joint meeting Friday afternoon in the American Legion building when the United Daughters of the Confederacy entertained the American Legion Auxiliary. The United States has never fought to suppress any other country, Mr. Hack said, and he asserted that a policy is to protect itself if necessary. The meeting opened with the salute to the American flag, the Confederate flag, and the American Legion flag, led by Mrs. H. A. Newell and Mrs. Alex Cooper. Several patriotic songs were sung, and Steve Flannagan, playing his cornet, and Mary Harrison, singing, presented a lovely arrangement of "I Pledge Allegiance to My Flag."

Highway Patrol Shake-Up Now Seems to Be Unlikely (Continued from Page One) gets fired, he said, it's going to be for what they do under his administration, not what they did in the past.

The commissioner's attitude undoubtedly has improved the patrol morale to some extent. Nevertheless, it is also true that there is still a lot to be done along this line. There is a general feeling in the organization that the two candidates for the job as major, may not be knowing each other as violently as they once were accused of doing but they could hardly be termed "bosom friends." And each has his following among the other officers and men. Moreover, all the men don't love their major. True or not, some of them claim that those who support the Commissioner are still treated like second-hand stepchildren and given the least desirable assignments. The "esprit de corps" among the 211 men who are supposed to enforce the highway laws still leaves something to be desired, as Ward well knows. In an effort to build up the spirit of the patrol and to make it more efficient, the commissioner is going to every man in for conferences in groups of five. The government is in one of the talks the other day. The talks seem to be making a good impression on the men. But there is one thing Ward is doing which is not so popular with some of the officers. In addition to the conferences with the various groups, the commissioner also has a private talk with every man. "I sit them down and ask them if they have anything they want to get on their chests or out of their eyes," he says. "And I promise to keep their confidence." There are quite a few officers and others who wonder just what some big-gutted patrolman might say in these little secret talks. Since he has been in office, Ward has fired only four members of the patrol. Two were discharged for drinking on the job, one because he had had four automobile accidents in six months and was considered a nuisance to himself as well as other on the road, and one because he did not have the temperament to make an officer. The chances are, one others will follow. Maybe there will be some "purging" among the commissioned personnel. But right now a general shake-up seems quite unlikely.

Reds Take Offensive Along Front (Continued from Page One) Leningrad heavy land and air fighting continued. Today's Moscow communique said that within the last six days one Russian air unit on this front had destroyed ten German tanks and 165 trucks with ammunition and German infantry, while another dispersed large German truck columns and destroyed 20 trucks and two tank cars.

The Moscow radio said that German casualties around Leningrad had amounted to 250,000 during October alone. With the Russians apparently standing firm, indications were that a lengthy stalemate would be developing. The Germans' admitted sharp slow-down was attributed by observers here to increasing winter weather and the natural exhaustion of hard driving Nazi troops as well as stirring opposition.

It was estimated some time ago that 20,000 civilian goods factories would be forced into suspension in the face of the situation then. Today's estimates run as high as twice that number. Ah, say the government's spokesmen, but look at the prodigious increase in demands from the anti-axis powers we're helping.

Uncle Sam Accused Of Storing Materials Not Now Required (Continued from Page One) Sam has enough of it, it's asserted, to last him for at least a year and a half, while they're threatened with the immediate shutdowns due to the absolute lack of it.

Priority sectors from little non-defense corporations simply swarm in Washington, and get nowhere. Their applications total around 5,000 weekly. If they definitely were turned down, they at least would be disposed of, but, in general, they never get to the right official's desk, but simply are shunted from one functionary to another, each professing to be the wrong chap to consider the matter.

With a view to strengthening out some of the confusion, the Commerce department is investigating a contact between the emergency agencies and the country's trade associations rather than with individuals. As a matter of fact, the Office of Production Management and newer setups are in communication with about 500 of these associations, but they total approximately 8,000, so that not much more than a beginning's being made.

Civilian consumerism, it's recognized, scarcely has begun to feel the pinch yet, but it's foreseen that the uproar will be something awe-inspiring as the famine in all sorts of ordinary conveniences and even necessities intensifies itself.

Not alone the consumers and small manufacturers and the latter employees are due to catch it, but retail merchandising will do so also, it's predicted, as shelves are left bare of most of the articles that customers are in the habit of buying.

National Price Fixer Leon Henderson is quite aware that his worries will multiply then, too, in the same ratio that defense and lease-lend production does, with civilian production shrinking correspondingly.

Checking Buyers Difficult It's agreed that perhaps a merchant can be prevented from hating his price tags, but how can would-be buyers be prevented from bidding against one another, regardless of what the tags say? Such competition's forbidden under penalty in a European country or two, but it's conceded that it must be almost impossible to suppress in the matter of a multitude of petty transactions.

On summer evenings, The roadside hedge Climbed where the roses climbed, The many stems Engaged in a wall. Beyond the ledge, Hidden, yet briefly seen, like towered spires, Each spoke aloof from neighbors, and from him, Gained about by grass and weeds and daisies. Impassioned and shy. There was a din Of noisy rain by the pasture ditch, Of thrills and mallow, mustard, and blue forget-me-not, In mood discordant clamor, bright and white. The simple-minded daisies, cool and cool, Were heated upon and jostled by their tall. And bold-eyed cousin Susans,.... Near the mill. Stood yellow, comes of loosestrife. Best of all, Were flaccid chiming softly on the hill. Martha Banning Thomas
