

Hauling Of Tobacco May Be Limited

Hauling of tobacco from one section to distant markets in another area or belt will probably be prohibited during the coming marketing season by reason of the gasoline and tire shortage, according to a policy of the State Office of Price Administration, as transmitted here today by the Office of War Information in Raleigh.

North Carolina farmers who have been using automobiles to transport tobacco to out-of-the-state markets have found the OPA crowns on such a practice because of the gasoline situation, the statement said.

These farmers regularly move their tobacco to South Carolina and Georgia markets because these markets open earlier than North Carolina auction centers, thereby enabling growers to obtain cash for their crop more quickly than if they waited for the North Carolina market to open, the OPA statement said.

"Since there is no advantage in this in-destination hauling, other than getting money earlier, we are recommending to our local war price and rationing board that禁令 (禁令) be limited to the closest auction houses," it was explained.

The statement said, "In this way, and without the aid of mail-order postmen, we can limit the shipping of tobacco to the eastern seaboard. I would repeat, since all the larger markets at and below comes to them from inflation, and thus avoids their own sales, it would be the same to the same time present, since growers from getting ahead, so far as the cost of the crop is concerned, and the price of tobacco is concerned, to the same time."
