The Forgotten "Man"

With a large section of the auto industry already tied into a knot and with little prospect of early settlement of the strike, another and still larger work stoppage looms in the north of the steel plants on the nation. Labor suffers as a result of the disputes, while industry itself loses profits and the nation as a whole is further deprived of the products of modern science and has a right to know the forgotten "man" in the picture.

If present trends are to continue unobstructed and to their logical end, a conclusion, a situation persisting on an on and on basis will be in effect. Labor and management each across the other, but in the process there is a nation that leads a personal life and is getting along with the task in hand without concern for the stake of the country as a whole.

President Truman has proposed to Congress a plan he thinks may reduce some sort of a remedy, but his plan has been denounced by labor leaders, although it is making some headway on Capitol Hill. What are the chances there, though that is not law, the statute books will be respected only more than in the past, and they have been and are being done and ignored?

Which poses the question, and raises the serious question as to whether or not the great government of the United States is impotent in the midst of crisis and whether it has the power to order the affairs of the people and if impotent in control of such questions, have the courage to move into action in applying the law. In all wonder, why may be better than any other. If government refuses to meet the challenge of an organization which controls a substantial block of votes, then we have reached the time when the welfare of 130 million people is detested by a very small minority of the whole group, and the will of the majority no longer signifies.

If ever there were a time when courage and determination were needed in administering this nation, that time is now. The urgent demand for a strong hand at the helm is becoming more and more evident daily. This is not to say that the President is other than that type, but this hour offers him the opportunity to demonstrate his stature as much as any experience that has yet come to him.

Indications point to the likelihood that the longer the present emergency continues the more it will spread. Ultimately conditions will become intolerable and will constitute an actual menace, and could conceivably get out of hand with potential consequences well nigh unpredictable. If it is possible to act now, this is the time for action.

It is unfortunate, even tragic, that labor and industry thus far have been unable to compose their differences, but if they cannot, government intervention is the only alternative. Seizure of automobile or steel plants settles nothing in itself. Two instances of that kind in the Montgomery Ward situation have demonstrated that conclusively. What is needed is a formula acceptable all around and that is fair and just to both sides, and one which will be permanent and serve as a safeguard for the future.
