MUSHROOMS AT DAWN

During the night, no questioning human eye may scan the field; and there are none to tell the movements in the grass; and none to trace the cattle's wanderings, devious and slow. The field lies tranquil in its privacy.

Light creeps across the country's face; the ground is overlaid with mist, solid and low. The field's creases, the cattle raise their heads in an unburied gesture, wakening to interest in the intruding sound.

Buttoned in secret tightness to the grass, the mushroom groups evade all casual eyes; but the cowboys, duck against the mist, heads lowered, and with footsteps fraying slow, trending in anxious care, circle and pass.

The cattle keep their mild and curious gaze, and watch the sudden eager stretching down of hands; hear soft thick plucking sounds, and voices raised in triumph or surprise. The mist is thinning now—the morning haze is fingered by gleams of sunshine, and the white fragments of stalk lie scattered here and there, and the note creaks departure; and the field lazily to the dew-soaked grass; the light is quiet again under the mounting light.
