FIFTH-GENERAL RECEIPT.

Go to 95 degrees after putting fire in barn in about two or three hours. Don't begin to count time until you reach 95 degrees. It is best to put fire in as soon as you get the tobacco in the barn, as fermentation takes place as soon as tobacco is cut, and the sooner it is cured the better. Tobacco will not cure well that hangs in the barn long enough to begin to yellow before the fire is put under it. In curing tobacco, if you are going too fast, the face side of the leaf will splotch, in this case drop back four or five degrees and remain an hour or two. Then proceed as you first intended. If your tobacco is thoroughly ripe before you leave 110, see that the lugs are dry, but not cured, the middle leaves yellow and the tips nearly yellow. If the should be only part yellow. You can not make yellow tobacco out of green tips if you cure the leaves bright. One important matter in curing tobacco is HENDERSON, VANCE COUNTY, N.G. to yellow it high enough to expell the sap while yellowing. If you are going too slow the face side of the leaf will sponge or redden. If tobacco should get to sweating while yellowing give it ventilation by opening the door or making holes under the barn about the size of your arm, or both until the sweat has passed off, then close the door and the holes and proceed as before. In examining tobacco it is best to use a smooth stick. By handling it with your bands it will blacken wherever you touch it. You can put tobacco nearer together in cool than in hot weather. Tobacco that is yellowed too slow will not be very tough as a general thing when cured, and by going too fast the oil is killed in the tobacco and it will be of less value,

In this case you may put more leaves to the bundle and they will look just as well or better. Then put it on well dressed sticks. Dressed sticks will prevent it from tearing while putting on and taking off. You may put from twenty to thirty bundles on a stick. After the bundles are put on the sticks you may bulk it down a day or two, being very careful to lay it straight, then hang it up and let it dry. Never let it lie long when in very high order. Don't carry your tobacco to market when in very high order unless you are compelled to. If you have handled your tobacco nicely and assorted it well you will be more than apt to get a good price for it.
