When it is remembered that Mrs. Semple was a little girl when Lafayette made his last visit to America, and a young woman before the Seminole Indians were finally pacified in Florida, it would seem that she almost belongs to another age. She saw the first telegraph wire in the United States stretched from Washington to Baltimore, and later was given a piece of the original Atlantic cable by S. F. B. Morse himself. She was present at the launching of the Allegheny, the first iron ship in the United States navy to be propelled by steam. She was acquainted with such notable figures in public life as Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, Washington Irving, Andrew Jackson, John Quincy Adams and numerous others.

Mrs. Semple in her youth was her father's constant companion. She was a good musician and was the life and spirit of his household. At the age of nineteen she became the wife of Mr. Semple

When the death of William Henry Harrison made Tyler President he brought a large and interesting family to the White House. Mrs. Tyler was an invalid and could never discharge the duties of mistress of the White House. During the first few months of Tyler's administration Mrs. Robert Tyler, wife of a son of the President acted as his hostess, while the President's daughter, Letitia, remained at their Virginia home with her mother. Some months later Mrs. Tyler made the trip to Washington, accompanied by her daughter, now Mrs. Semple, but succumbed to her malady very shortly afterward and was buried from the White House, of which she had never been able to assume the duties of mistress. After the death of her mother Mrs. Semple assumed the duties of mistress of the White House, which she discharged with grace and tact until her father's second marriage, only a few months before his term of of-

Miss Julia Gardner of New York. Like most elderly people, Mrs. Sem-ple lives in the past. Her last visit to the White House was during the administration of President Pierce, whose family were intimate friends. Since that time, although invitations have come to her for every function given there and are still coming, she has paid no attention to them. She leads a quiet life in the Louise Homo for the Aged, which is filled with Southern ladies of gentle birth and culture. The home is not a charitable institution, for each woman must pay for her board and room. The charge is modest, as the institution was hand-somely endowed by the founder, the late philanthropist, W.
