VANITY'S REWARD.

BY [illegible]

A few years ago, in [illegible], James Stoneburn, a rich and miserly lawyer, living in the aristocratic part of the city of New York, rang the bell on his private sitting room, and summoned Ellen Grayam, his step-daughter, to his presence.

Ellen, a fair and lovely girl of eighteen years, sadly stood before her stepfather, with more of dread than self-reliance in her manner.

"You sent for me, Sir," said Stoneburn, in a sharp voice. "You found me of my late wife, your mother, should nothing but whine and weep until she died. Sit down."

"She had cause enough to weep," said Ellen, with much spirit, and indignant that her mother should be alluded to so scornfully. "She never made but one mistake in her life, and that was when she married you, James Stoneburn. Sir, great a mistake that for ten years she grieved over it, and then died."

"Enough! I have sent for you to know whether you will marry Simon Cline or not?"

"My answer shall be given to Simon Cline, and not to you, sir," replied Ellen.

"Your dignity demands that, I suppose," said Stoneburn, with a sneer. "Mr. Cline."

As he spoke, a large curtain, hiding an alcove window, was moved aside, and a tall, elderly man, with dark and sinister face, placed himself before Ellen Grayam.

"Simon Cline awaits his doom," said this man, bowing and grinning.

Ellen started at his unexpected presence, but, recovering her natural firmness very soon, said to him:

"I inform Mr. Cline that I can never be his wife. Mr. Cline is old enough to be my father."

"The greater your chance of being a rich young widow, my dear," said Simon Cline.

"I have given my final decision," said Ellen, boldly. "I will now retire, hoping never to be again insulted by either of you."

"Stay," said Stoneburn, "I will tell you the exact amount of coal that, having heard them, you may be induced to reconsider your decision, and change it."

"Nothing can force me to change it; so let me retire," said Ellen.

"You must hear," said Stoneburn. "Your refusal to [illegible] Clever, my young [illegible] Heir to [illegible]"

"A scoundrel! Harry Tyler a scoundrel!" exclaimed Ellen, with [illegible]
