Mr. Hood replied: "That is my principle, and I am inclined to vote that way." Nothing further was said at that

On Monday following, about o'clock Mr. Pendleton called Mr. Hood up to his office and said: "I have been studying over the matter you, but I will have to ask you to resign. I can't have a man at work opinion, when I know it is against

Mr. Hood, who was very much surprised at this brutal attempted coercoin, said: "I will willingly resign, as supporting Bryan is my principle, and I wouldn't change my principles for all the situations. If I haven's always given the company satisfaction I have never heard anything to the contrary."

Mr. Pendleton said: "We have nothing against your work at all. On the next morning Mr. Hood tendered his resignation by writing the following:
