> In the province of Samara for which much of the relief provision was destined, the suffering is described as terrible. Of a total population of 2,500,000, fally 1,500,000 are in want and 500,000 of these are distribution of the flour and other provisions has been accompanied by remarkable scenes.

Peasants have fallen on the ground before the agents, kissing theis han is and the hems of their coats. Thousands, who had resigned them selves upon bearing news of the relief at hand and crawled to the soup kitchens and pleces of distribution. Half the people are almost without clothes and many peasants corre with their children to beg aid. In the smaller villages the meals now set before the poor are the first they have tasted for months. They were found living on grass, the bark of trees, and the seeds of weeds.

The roads to all the larger towns in Samara are thronged with beggars. Often a group of ten or welve may be seen sleeping in the rain and sleet by the wayside. Deaths on the road are of frequent occurence and the bodies are either ouried under a few mocher of earth by companions, or, if tear a village, are left for the authorities to bury. The central government's efforts to allay the distress are still inefficient, owing to indifference and corruption among the subordinate officials,
