Two of Life's Tragedies - The Blind Man and the Drunkard.

The blind pencil-vender was at his post yesterday afternoon. Down East Trade street, more than in the other directions, the wind suggested autumn.

Amid the shuffle of feet on the pavement and the noise of traffic stood the blind man, his chin on his breast, his shoulders drooped, crying his wares.

While two friends were standing near looking at him and commenting on the sadness of his lot and the mystery of the Providence that had his making, along came the patrol wagon, rolling merrily to the Toms, with a drunken prisoner.

The life that raised up clay and molded this blind man of it, put lungs and heart and brains into it, has fought its path through death for a million years.

And here it is, blind. But, mind you, that persistent cry: "Pencil! Pencil!" It is not tired or discouraged; it is fighting still.

But the drunk fellow went merrily on to prison. A million years of struggle has resulted in him; all the sweet springs have bickered their way to this bitter sea.
