WEDDING RINGS AT McCALL'S.

VIEWS AND INTERVIEWS
Esq. McWhirter Believes "Bugs" are on His Place.

Experts may say the boll weevil has never been in Jackson township, but there is one citizen of that famous community, Esq. Henry McWhirter, the famous Democratic war-horse, who is firmly convinced of an invasion by the famous cotton pest into the beloved domains of his native haunts. Says the Esquire: "In conversation with parties from the infested boll weevil area of Texas and Arkansas at the old soldiers' reunion in Atlanta, I was told that when I found a white worm in a faulty boll of cotton I would know it was a boll weevil. These worms, so I was told, would drop on the ground after the boll opened, where they would go into winter quarters, incidentally laying thousands of eggs. The following summer they would reappear in the cotton fields as a full developed boll weevil, and then their work of destruction would begin. When I returned home from the reunion, I began to cast an eye about for faulty cotton bolls. I collected a few, and on opening them, discovered white worms, similar to those described by the fellows in Atlanta. I am convinced they were boll weevils. They may do no much damage next summer, but I am expecting them to play havoc with my cotton in 1921."

Work of Cotton Statistician

There isn't much official dignity attached to the office of cotton statistician, which probably accounts for the insignificance in which some people hold the job. On the contrary, the job is an important one, and the reports of statisticians have great bearing on cotton quotations. If you are inclined to minimize the importance of the cotton statistician, listen to the following facts, obtained from Mr. R. K. Helms, who held that office in this county for six years:

"The cotton statistician is supposed to visit every ginner in the county about ten times a year to secure figures for the amount of cotton ginned up to the date of his coming. No reports, except in extreme cases, are permitted to be collected over the telephone or through the mails. When I first acted as statistician, there were sixty gins in this county, and to see each ginner I had to traverse about 230 miles, or 2,200 miles during the year. The remuneration for this work is nearly $350 per annum, but in this day and time, considering the high cost of transportation, the amount is not sufficient pay for the time devoted to it. The last year I served the automobile which I hired to go over the county cost me 14 cents a mile, or $29 the trip.

"When the figures are collected, the statistician has to wire the total to the bureau of markets at Washington. This wire is followed by a letter, giving the name of each ginner, and the number of bales he ginned to the day of the report. The statistics have to be exact in every detail, and should an error of one bale in the total be made the report would be returned for correction."

Mr. Helms today carries the marks of frost-bitten heels, which he received one severe winter day two years ago when he spent from early morning until 9 o'clock at night getting reports from ginner's. On that day he did not get out of his buggy until he reached his home at night.

Trials of the Postman.

An average of about 9,000 letters a week are delivered in Monroe by the three city carriers, according to Mr. J. A. Williams, the senior of the other two carriers in point of service. Anywhere from fifty to five hundred letters are collected by the carriers from the patrons of the route each day.

As a general rule says Mr. Williams, carriers have no complaints to make of their dealings with patrons, though occasionally some people make unreasonable requests of them to perform slight services not in connection at all with the mail service. When asked if the continual interrotation, "haven't I any mail," worried him, Mr. Williams replied: "Well, I have got used to them always asking me for mail, but the best way to answer your question is to relate a little incident that occurred on my route one day: I had just passed a home when somebody called out: 'Haven't you got any mail for me, Mr. Williams?' Before I could answer a little boy said: 'Do you think he is a fool? Don't you know if he had some mail for you he'd let you know?'"

Fayetteville is planning a big reception to General Pershing when he will inspect Camp Bragg about Friday or Saturday.
