"FIDDLING" ALF TAYLOR LEADING IN TENNESSEE

FAMOUS POLITICIAN HAS LEAD OVER GOV. ROBERTS

Comes Out Into Political Arena After Retirement of 25 Years—His First Race Famous.

Nashville, Tenn., Nov 3—After being in political retirement for twenty-five years, and with more than a third of a century between his first and second race for governor, Alfred Alexander Taylor, familiarly known as "Alf" Taylor, waged a vigorous campaign.

Mr. Taylor was past the three score and ten mark when he entered the race for the Republican nomination in the primary of August 5 last. In the beginning many Tennesseans who knew him simply as the brother of "Our Bob," late Democratic Governor and Senator from Tennessee, looked upon his campaign as hardly a matter for serious consideration. This view underwent a change when Colonel Taylor took the stump and began an active campaign. It became evident that it was a one man's race practically all over the State. So "Alf" Taylor woke up on his seventy-second birthday to find himself the Republican nominee for Governor of Tennessee for the second time in his life.

"War of the Roses."

Taylor's first race for Governor was the most famous affair of the kind in the history of the State. On June 18, 1886, the Republican State convention met in Nashville, and the late Richard W. Austin, for several terms Congressman from the second Tennessee district, nominated Taylor for Governor.

The Democratic state convention met on August 11, 1886, and after considerable jockeying, nominated Robert L. Taylor, "Our Bob," for Governor on the fifteenth ballot. Thus it was that Tennessee's "War of the Roses" was set going.

The two Taylors made a tour of the State, speaking to immense crowds. They hammered the opposition party and poked fun at one another, but wound up each day with brotherly affection unimpaired. After a tour of the Sequatchie Valley, in the course of the campaign, the two stopped at Bridgeport, Ala., for the night as guests of a Mrs. Jones, who had heard them speak that afternoon at Jasper. The good woman was greatly impressed with the consideration the brothers showed each other, not only in debate at Jasper, but about the hospitable fireside of the home. The next morning she gathered from her garden two bouquets of roses, one white and the other red. Returning she found Alf and Bob waiting to say good-bye. To each she presented one of the bouquets.

Given Two Roses.

"I want you to accept these flowers, gentlemen," said the warm-hearted hostess, "for the sake of your mother; I know that she must be proud of her boys, who can be politicians and still be brothers. I know that her heart is with you and that her blessings follow you."

Bob Taylor received the white roses and Alf the red. Thereafter during the campaign Bob Taylor was known as the "Knight of the White Rose," and Alf as "Knight of the Red Rose," and Robert was still known as the "Knight of the White Rose" when he defeated Edward W. Carmack for re-nomination as United States Senator in 1906. The "War of the Roses" between the Taylor brothers ended in the November election 1886 with Robert the victor.

Alf Taylor became a member of Congress from the First Tennessee district on March 4, 1889, and served for three terms, declining further nomination and taking up the practice of law in Johnson City, Tenn., where he is extensively interested in farming. He is the father of several sons, one of whom, following the family bent for political division, is a democrat.
