The public has already been acquainted through the press with the suffering in parts of the Turkish empire, which is most appalling, both in its extent and character. It is probable that 50,000 people have been put to death and no less than 350,000 are now entirely destitute and in danger of perishing, unless relief is furnished promptly.

Relatively small amounts have een raised in England and Amerea and distributed through local channels, but it is clear that nothing commensurate with the needs can be accomplished except through and the best helper is the Old Friend, Sim- a strong and thoroughly represent-
