At the upper part of the Mareourms building at the exposition there was exhibited a wonderful piece of clock work in the form of a small house constructed of couper and bronze. It was the work of I M Goldfadoff, a Rossian clockmaker. The facade, which was five feet in length and five feet and six inches n height, represented a Russian r-ilway station with its telegraph flice, station agent's office, icket office, and even a buffet. Opposite the s'ation th le was a garden with fountains, trees and flowers, and surrounding the garden a rail way with gates, semaphores, lubricator's box, water tack, etc. In the cupalo that surrounded the station was housed the clockwork mechanism. This in the first place controlled several dials that indicated the time at various points of the day and the phases of the moon, and in the second a system of pulleys and wheels that gave life to the station once a day. When noon sounded a lever was set in operation and the nonncement of the arrival of a train. Some men are always meddling around the house and doing foolish things, like the Chicago man who didn't know that his wife had converted the rag bag inte a savings bank. While she was out he sold the rag bag to a rag man and got 11 cents for it. He told his wife about it when she came home, and then she had deposited in the bag. At last accounts the husband was anxionsly looking for the rag man who looked like his rag man, but, sad to tell, he hadn't found him.
