Killed at a Railroad Crossing.

Mr. Watt Sinclair was killed this morning about 9 o'clock at the West Fifth street crossing of the Southern Railway

Mr. Sinclair had, only a few minutes before, been in Oates' cotton mill where his daughter and son-in law work. He left the mill to re turn to his home in the brick row, adjoining Elmwood cemetery. As be crossed the tracks of the Southern, the engine of No. 33, the South bound fast mail, struck him and knocked him to one side of the track.

Mr. Sinclair was slightly deaf and it is thought that he did not hear the approach of the train. It is also stated that from the point where he crossed the tracks of the encies of war to take possession of by the cotton warehouse of the Oates Sonthern, his vision was obscured mill. Another party states that an engine was standing to the man's right and this would have hindered him from seeing the train as it approached the crossing. As it is well known, Fifth street, where it crosses the tracks, is very narrow, and has, for a number of years, been known as one of the most dangerous points in the city. Buildings stand near the tracks on both sides and it is almost an impossibility for one to see a train as it proaches the crossing. Mr. Sinclair was about 60 years old and was a steady, hard working man. He had made Charlotte his home for a number of years and was liked by all .- Charlotte News.
