MANY TIMES MULTIPLIED

Good Roads and Automobiles Make Game Preserves Easy of Access

Quail Abundant Everywhere and Rare Sport Awaits the Hunter in Surrounding Covers

PINEHURST'S fifty-thousand-acre Preserves are, indeed, a "corner" in this the age when shooting grounds everywhere have been monopolized by individuals and clubs. Their extent also has been many times multiplied by good roads and the automobile. Making headquarters at the Village, every nook and corner is accessible and the season's shooting promises the rarest of sport, for the summer was an unusual one. Many pairs of ence. Years ago the hunting of this noble bird was a business here to many natives who now follow it in the capacity of guides, recognizing that they can no longer afford to kill for market or personal use in view of the value set upon this trophy by visitors. From standpoint of excitement, an occasional pigeon drive will rank with duck shooting and from time to time a woodcock, snipe or hare may be added to the string. But ever and always, is the joy of contact with God's glorious Open in this the land where one steps backward from winter into September; gaining months on life.

As for the material side, you will find the equipment as complete as that of private country estate or wealthy club. Saddle horse, shooting wagon, or automobile will transfer you from hotel to cover and the dogs will meet your most exacting requirements. Estes, Wicker and Nail, well known as guides will again add to both the pleasure and success of the outing with the noonday meal a spread which Fifth Avenue cannot equal. Surely "the joy of the hunter on earth all sur- passes."

"SQUAD ONE" OF THE MIDWINTER HANDICAP

birds have raised two broods as was indicated during August when frequently a flock of nearly full grown quail were seen with the cock, while near at hand, a brood of fledglings were following the hen. The protected land in the immediate vicinity of the Village, reserved for training the dogs of the Kennels, has also proved an important factor in propagation as well as adequate protection from pot hunters and natural enemies.

Taken season in and season out, bob-white ranks first among America's game birds. He may not have the quickness of the grouse or the cleverness of the woodcock, but he is game to the core and if you keep your percentage of kills high, you may deservedly line up with the experts and be sure of your share of the winnings. Thus it is that when New England covers don the garb of drear winter, the thoughts of the hunter turn to Pinehurst with its unending autumn. Memory and anticipation are equally pleasant for best of all, days afield are lived again when long miles separate.

Few lovers of dog and gun there now are who are not devotees of the open, and if golf, tennis, trap shooting or riding do not interest, an occasional day in pursuit of the wild turkey proves a novel experi-

"Book Me for the Handicap"

"Book me for the Midwinter Handicap," writes Mr. John Philip Sousa, one of the first of many advance entries. "The boys are all talking about it," he continues, "Your entrance will be a record breaker." Mr. Sousa is only one of many prominent professional and business men who are finding in trap shooting increasing attraction. "Deep massage" Mr. Sousa very aptly styles it.

Promising Youngsters at Kennels

One finds many old and numerous interesting new friends at the Kennels; modern hunting dogs of class. In field or on bench they command admiration as the climax of 20th century breeding and training. The string of young dogs is unusually promising, progressing rapidly under the usual training.

Sixth Win in Massachusetts Open

Professional Alexander Ross captured the Massachusetts Open for the sixth time during the past summer, but various duties have made it impossible for him to figure in competitive play as frequently as in the past.
