THE DESERTERS' CHRISTMAS

tones that no real soldier has any respect for men who shirked duty and that they must move on, warning them that if this news got abroad here in Raleigh the men might expect any consequences. Then he turned on his heels and walked away with the ex-Confederate. These two were united on one subject at least.

Meanwhile the deserters and the poor wife and children made their way to the country and sought to set themselves down in their own neighborhood; but there fate, as hard as iron and as bitter as the cold of that Christmas night, pointed her finger at them and bade them begone. And so they drifted, further and further away; passed beyond the confines of the State and beyond all memory and reckoning, and the only thing which remains to mark the fact that they ever existed is that dreadful word, "Deserted," set against the name of each man. Never for them the tender thoughts and the glorious ones, too, of Memorial Day; never that touch of elbows and of comradeship which in all the passing years, to this good hour marks the meetings of true soldiers; and for the poor little wife and mother and those other wives, too, nothing of the pride in the cause, the joy in their home-coming braves, or any of those tender offices which have ever marked the women of the South.

It is a wild place yet, that place of the cave; strangely wild and remote, far from the madding crowd, seeming as if some true bit of mountain ruggedness had been set down here; but surely of all its memories none could possibly be stranger than that of the Christmas dinner in the lair of the deserters.
