

then embraced South Carolina also, he having landed at Charlestown and come through the country that way, and being afterwards burned to death by the angry Tuscorora Indians, who tied him to a stake, stripped him and stuffed his body full of splinters of fat pine, which the darkeys call "light-wood."

Lawson was very much impressed by the beauty of the scenery in this Wake Forest section, and dwelt upon it in his book. He found the Indians catching fish in weirs, killing them with spears and shooting them with bows and arrows and found "shad fish" very abundant; the Indians baking these on all sides of a big fire they made—"planking" them, as we now say. The region around Wake Forest has always been fine for quail, the country being generally open and free from swamps.

Wake Forest will, in some respects, remind visitors from the North of an Old New England village, with its wide streets, drooping elms and precise houses, each set in a good-sized yard, with great oaks standing here and there. In the northern part of the place there is a cotton mill, with an admirable public school, in the maintenance of which the mill takes a good part, according to the general custom in North Carolina, some of the mill schools, as they are schools, having much reputation; one at Pilot Mills, at Raleigh, outranking all in this city in percentage of attendance. It is singular, but true, that there is a cotton mill at every university or college town in North Carolina, so that Wake Forest is no exception. It is not far from Wake Forest to the Franklin county line, and then the motorist gets on some of the finest sand-clay roads in the country, that county having recently completed its system of these highways, which get no end of compliments, the roads in that county having been, like those in Wake, built mainly by convict labor. Wake employing 100 convicts on its highways, these being divided in four gangs or camps, according to the custom, in about 40 of the counties in North Carolina, there being two classes of convicts in this state. These are known as state convicts or county convicts, the former numbering about 825 and the latter about 2,000.

Any Globe Trotters Here?

To the Editor of The New York Tribune:
Sir: Having just retired from business life I am contemplating a trip around the world, which I have been looking forward to for many years, and now that my dream is about to be realized and having had no previous experience in travelling (outside of America) I am at a loss as to route, stopping places of interest, length of time at each point, etc., and thought, perhaps, one of your kind readers might be able to offer some suggestions, based on his or her own experience. ¶ I am extremely fond of music, art and scenery and am thinking of making a three-year trip. ¶ Any information or suggestions from any of your readers will be greatly appreciated.

Back from Pinehurst

Cliff Lyall, the enterprising Village banker, returned from Pinehurst, N. C., last wk. with a elegant coat of tan & sev'l additional golf stix. Cliff reports that he was sort of sorry he had to leave when he did as his golf playing was getting so superfine that Francis Ouimet of here looked sort of scared every time he got anywhere near him. Some guy was unkind enough to suggest that Francis looked scared because nobody could ever tell where Cliff's ball was going to go; but Cliff says this is a calumny.—Boston Post.
