Adventures in Contentment

a bit of pone, and told him, and he said much obliged and was gone. He just lemme be.

No sir, they never troubled nobody in these parts. We never had no trouble with the Yankees at all. They didn't mess with nothin'. Just went on about their business. Next day we heard the cannon and the shooting again, and they killed another passel of 'em up the line a bit. One was killed just below here, and is buried on the old McNair place—yes, the one Gates' got now—and his folks been here to see it. Heard tell Jim McLeod shot him, but dunno. Jim was a picket on the swamp that day.'

TO REPEL THE INVADER

I asked the old fellow if he was for "preparedness."

"What for?" says he.

"I've heard," I said, "that the Germans are terrible fighters, and that they could land and take the country without an effort, most any day."

The embers reflected a cynical scorn on the battered features. "If they wuz to ever come to No'th Calina, they'd git the stuffin' knocked out of 'em. Old as I am, I'd take down my gun, and tell my old woman to put me up a snack, and we'd shoot the hell out of 'em. What-a-yer talking about? I guess we're all ready for the like of that. They'd better not any Dutchmen come foolin' around here."

We rolled in our blankets and slept under the stars. And next morning launched a canoe, and whirled away into the unknown.

THE BRIMMING RIVER

The stream is fast enough to be exhilarating, and displays a little temper now and then, and has many moods, but is in nowise dangerous. It rushes from the camp into the heart of a great estuary, and takes a pride in exhibiting a country wild and varied and picturesque. It turns and twists and wanders, as if it saught vainly to throw you off the trail and lose you in the jungle. And then again, it broadens out into long straight stretches, where resting on the paddle, under a canopy of over-hanging foliage, you drift down the stream in the wake of a blue heron, and readily imagine yourself on the Zambesi, or the River of Doubt, alone with Nature at the end of the world.

HOW IT IS DONE

Any fellow can take this trip any day. A motor will reach Blue's Bridge in half an hour and can be on hand in a few hours to pick the party up again at the "Highway" ten miles below.
