Holing-Out-in-One

That rarest and most impressive of all golfing feats has been achieved a surprising number of times in the last year or two. Golfers, both tyros and veterans, dream of performing it some time. But to drive several hundred feet with the accuracy of a sharpshooter, land on the green with precisely the momentum to push the ball to the cup and not overrun it, would be such a prodigy of skill that it is attributed usually to luck, and the happy golfer is right glad to obey the time-honored rule which requires him to play the hose at the club house to every person on the links.

One player this season has twice holed out in one. In a match at Pocono he drove 675 feet and pocketed the ball in the tiny cup; a few weeks before in an open tournament he holed his tee shot in a drive of 444 feet. Moreover, three years before he for the first time put the feat to his credit at a distance of 585 feet. That record is unsurpassed.

But probably the most remarkable shot of the kind ever achieved is a part of the golfing history of the famous veteran, Walter J. Travis. He was preparing for the Pinehurst winter tournament, and drove the ball out of sight over a low hill; when it disappeared it was traveling fast and straight for the hole, and on the green he found it snugly lodged therein. However, a short time ago the secretary of the United States Golf Association, Howard F. Whitney, playing with borrowed clubs on the St. Regis links in the Adirondacks, and playing from a bunker at that, made his first hole-in-one in a score of years at a distance of 525 feet. In July, J. C. Lord at the Sleepy Hollow Country Club, although he was far in the rear in the tournament, achieved all the fame of the meeting by scoring the great shot at 453 feet. Others who have made the shot lately are T. C. Watkins and R. C. Kerr, both of whom scored it at Baltusrol at the same distance, 546 feet, and Fred McLeod at Chicago, whose distance was 351 feet. It is a spectacular feat, but it is never likely to become common.

The Wisest Customs of the Persians

(Herodotus—Book 1)

Now the customs of the Persians
We have seen in our excursions,
Or, when swarming into Hellas,
They have sought to make incursions.
Much they do seems rather crazy,
But one custom is a daisy,
Their idea of matrimony
Is by no means dull or hazy.
If a maid is blessed with beauty
She will fetch her weight in booty
At the auction all are anxious
To assume the husband's duty.
Then they take this pretty penny
Which they get for handsome Jenny
Give it to some freckled sister,
Then she's popular as any.
Therefore every maid can marry
And the pussy and canary
Never occupy apartments
Where the human male should tarry.
