To the Rescue

The Governor of North Carolina has set aside Friday next for the particular attention of the people of the State to consider their obligation and pleasure as Christian and kindly folks to the stricken population of Belgium. It is an unusual pronouncement from the executive mansion; but it is an unusual circumstance.
The reports and first hand information provided reveals a condition among the women and children of the ruined country which makes it absolutely impossible for us to play and laugh and put our money in the bank, and to complacently contemplate three thousand miles of the unharvested sea between us and devastation, without a feeling of heartlessness.

It has been truly said that hardly a human being lives who cannot be dependent upon if he is really trusted. In the last ditch even the poorest of the race will stand by to save a drowning man, or to champion the helpless in distress. We are in that position now. The sad eyes and hungry hearts of many a woman stranded far from home are turned to us in confident and personal appeal. This is not figurative, or rhetorical. We we moved to write this supplement to the Governor's appeal by incidents personally known to us, almost too pitiful to relate. American girls nursing in Belgium write home that they must have clothing, or money. That they must, their very honor depends upon it. For when they are appealed to by destitute and hopeless mothers, they have said "Be of good cheer. It will be all right. I promise it will be all right.

When they know that you are naked and suffering and driven from home, and in such pitiful way, my people will send you relief. All I have to do is to tell them. I promise."

And it is inconceivable that it should not be so. In their place you and I would say the same thing. It is our right—a part of our tradition and inheritance, to depend on the charity and support and loyal spirit of our own people, in times of great stress or pitiful circumstance. And so they say, these girls, that all will be well when America hears the call.

Now we know very well that millions have been sent from here to Belgium, and that even the most vital appeal can become stale by repetition, or long duration. From the point of view of the journalist it is no longer of interest that millions fall dying before the scourge.
But we have no right to neglect it for that reason, or to fail with all our power to bring home to those with long rolls and scant worries the first duty in the world—to the helpless and the oppressed.

To make the matter concrete and effective it is best done as the Governor suggests, at one time, consciously by the community. Friday is the day. On that day we either do or do not listen to the appeal made to us so hopefully and with such faith and confidence, and we do or do not fulfill the promises made by our confident countrywomen who depend upon us to make good their word.

Of course at bottom our natures are very much alike. If we saw things as they are seen by the Red Cross in Flanders, or if you had read what we have,
and knew not only the desperate need, which only the private citizens of this country can possibly fill, but the pitiful gratitude and confidence thousands of wistful and gentle souls had in us, you would not only send a check to E. Alexis Taylor, 23 Haywood Street, Asheville.
You would move all heaven and earth to triple the amount, and would stop all else to urge the pity of it, and the help for it, on all men.

PROCLAMATION

Belgium Day, March 17, 1916

"Whereas, deep distress and misery exists in Belgium and Northern France.
Three millions of women and children are in dire need of food and clothing, and "We have already given generously to these destitute people, but there yet exists an alarming shortage of necessary clothing, and

"Glad to see you—I've a place in my squad for you."
