A Setter Dog's Reverie

THE REAL THING

right up with Morgan and when I got that point on the covey down in the branch, Morgan said he thought I was on a point and he went right out and hunted for me and found me, too, and walked right up to the birds and flushed them and got one with each barrel, and he didn't run up to where the birds fell either!

"That's one thing I can't understand. Men will say the dogs are no good if they break at shot, yet half of them will break at shot themselves, just as if they wanted to retrieve the bird! Chasing after a winged bird or looking for a dead one, is half the fun of hunting. Yet after we have pointed, often standing many minutes, when we are so nervous we can hardly restrain ourselves, waiting to give them a shot, and when they do kill a bird they still expect us to stand while they rush ahead of us to do what we have been taught was our work, our reward!

"As a general rule the man who does this is the man who can't get his gun together because he lays it in the sand, who keeps Morgan side stepping and thinking of his family, makes Shaw speculate on the future, and wears the dogs all out because he's so slow walking in on the point. I imagine that seeing a bird that he has shot at drop is so much of a novelty that he can't wait to have the dog bring the bird back to satisfy himself that it is really true. There's some consolation, however, in feeling that Morgan understands and in the fact that it don't happen every day.

"Here we are at the Carolina! Well, there's nothing doing until tomorrow anyway, and a good supper's waiting at the kennels.
