THE PINEHURST OUTLOOK

Premier Golfer's Estimate of the Carolina Champion

(Reprinted from the Baltimore American) In looking over the list of promising golfers, Charles Evans, Jr., the national amateur and open champion, has seen fit to devote considerable thought to Norman Maxwell, probably the most brilliant amateur ever developed in the Philadelphia district. This lad, who first began to swing a club at Aronimink when a wee chap, strange to say, seems to show to best advantage on Southern courses.

Not that he cannot boast of many fine performances in the North, especially about Philadelphia, but considering the amount of playing his average in the South is more noteworthy. Only the other day Maxwell won the postponed tournament at Pinehurst, and last March at the same place he captured the North and South title, which he now holds. But to return to "Chick," who in a recent article wrote in part as follows:

"I first met Maxwell at Pine Valley last spring, but it was not until a cold day in November that I saw him actually swing a club. For several holes he did not look particularly like a golfer; he was all bundled up and appeared to lack the rangy, long muscled appearance we are given to associate with the game, for, on the contrary, he appeared rather short of stature and heavily muscled. Looks however, are very deceiving, and I had decided occasion before that round was over to change my mind.

"On the day that we played together I watched him carefully for thirty-eight holes, and when we were finished I was convinced that he was a fine golfer. There are those who say he has the wrong temperament. In other words, he has a temper and gets red hot mad. I imagine that when he was learning he broke a good many clubs, but I am well acquainted with a certain golfer who had just such a temper in his earlier days and having been taught by golf to control it, afterward attained an exceptional degree of success.

"The length of Maxwell's back swing is more like three-quarters, and I heartily approve of it. His swing is very upright. Indeed, he ascends in so upright a manner that he has a peculiar little flick at the topmost part of the swing, reminding me of George Duncan, the British professional. This gives a pretty little throw to the clubhead and some power, resulting in a fine ball of good distance. As I see it there is only Golf Tennis Motoring Hunting and Fishing CHARLES E.
