Miracle of Illumination

By MYRA CURTIS LANE

(© 1923, Western Newspaper Union.)

THE Works monopolized him—that husband of hers who had sworn to love and cherish and protect her, thought Barbara bitterly. That was what came of marrying a man out of pique because one's sweetheart had gone away and left one.

Barbara had been all but engaged to Richard Nevins before she ever met Cy Hoadley. But they had quarreled, and Dick had gone away, and Mr. Hoadley had asked her again and—

That was three years ago, and Dick was back in town again.

Cyrus didn't know that, but then he knew and cared for nothing except the Chemical Works. And Dick was standing in front of Barbara, pleading.

"Barbara, it was all a ghastly mistake. I never ceased to care for you. I was coming back to tell you so, when I heard you were married. Then I went West, and I'm rich now, Barbara."

She lifted her eyes coolly to his, amazed that he could not see how her heart was beating. It was astounding that he could not hear that heavy hammering in her ears.

"My sister wrote me that your marriage had been a mistake, that you didn't care for him—"

That was Dick's first mistake. He had always been a little lacking in tact—poor Dick. That had been at the root of their bitter quarrel. Some instinct had told Barbara that Dick was not quite thoroughbred. But then there was her love for him. That love she had denied.

He did not see how she repented the fact of her unhappiness becoming the gossip of the town.

Dick seized her hands. "Barbara, I've come back to tell you that I still love you."

"You—you have no right to tell me, Dick," she faltered. Oh, how hard it was to resist him when all her heart went out in longing toward him.

"Barbara!" Dick's face was very near her own. "I want you to come West with me and let us begin a new life together. Will you leave everything for love's sake, Barbara?"

A sudden ringing of the telephone interrupted them. Coolly Barbara detached her hands and went to the instrument. She took down the receiver. Next moment she had hung it up and was looking at Dick with a ghastly expression on her face.

"There's been an accident at the Works," she faltered. "My husband has been badly hurt. You must go now."

And even then he hadn't the tact to see that for the immediate present his moment had passed. Presently the ambulance came up with Cyrus Hoadley.

He had been badly burned. The doctor held out no hope of life. There would be intense suffering for a few days, then—the end.

That struggle was the hardest Barbara had ever endured. Sitting beside the rich man, hearing her name mentioned in his delirium, tending him, fighting down her love for Dick.

He came every day to inquire, but it was on the day of the crisis that he spoke again:

"Barbara, I hear Doctor Bentwick has said that there's no chance of his recovery. I don't want to bother you, Barbara, but it's a miracle of luck for us. When it's all over we—"

Barbara never knew what impulse made her turn on Dick so fiercely, and she listened to her voice as if it had come from strange lips.

"Dick," she said, "when you leave me—immediately—I want you never to enter this house again or attempt to speak to me. That's my answer."

An ugly sneer curved his lips. "So you've made a fool of me again?"

"I'm true to my husband as long as he lives."

"Well, he won't live, don't worry." Dick flung himself out of the house, and never to the last day of his life did he understand.

But Barbara was sitting beside her husband and listening again to the delirious tale of his love for her. He had known there was another, he had tried to forget by shutting himself up with his business, but he loved her.

Toward dawn the delirious man came slowly back to consciousness. He looked at her incredulously.

"You, Barbara? The—the accident—"

She bent and kissed him. "Hush, dearest. It's all right now, everything."

He seized her hand. "Barbara, I—I thought—"

"I know, dear. That was a mistake too," she answered.

She had never seen him smile so contentedly as when he dropped off to sleep. She sat there till the doctor entered.

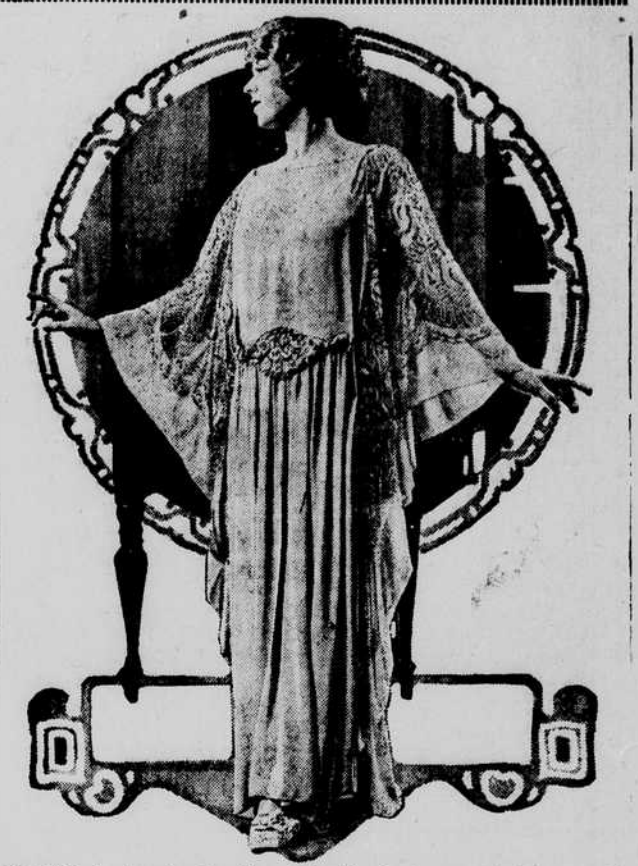

"Why, Mrs. Hoadley, you've worked a miracle," he exclaimed. "I believe he's got a chance now."

Barbara only smiled. It was the miracle of illumination.

GAY AND FANCY FABRICS INSPIRE LOVELY NEGLIGEES

WHEN the story is of negligees it has no end—the name "negligee" embraces so many types of indoor garments and all these types are so greatly varied. Summing up the mode becomes difficult, for negligees include tea or hostess gowns, as well as lounging robes, breakfast coats, bed jackets and the like.

Few women need a tea gown but every one of them must have a negligee of some sort. When they have time for lounging it can be done with the greatest satisfaction in a colorful and pretty negligee, to say nothing of the item of comfort. Breakfast time demands a cheerful and easily put on garment. All negligees are loose and flowing and the way of the designer has been smoothed by the vogue of silky laces in combination with crepe or fancy fabrics in silk or cotton and by the latitude in styles and materials.

The present season finds certain style points almost universal, as classic lines, wing sleeves, cape and tunic effects, boleros and plaitings. A lovely exponent of the mode appears in the negligee pictured, which is made of crepe de chine and lace dyed to match. It has a twisted ribbon girde with a front ornament of lace and ribbon.

When the item of warmth must be considered, there are tapestry cloths for the handsomest negligees, and printed chiffon velvets. Most popular of all are those of cotton corduroy, but a late and promising new arrival is made of soft, closely knitted wool yarn—it is cozy and cheerful, with all the grace of its silken sisters. There are many pretty printed cottons or mercerized fabrics, that are made up with ribbons and laces into bed jackets and breakfast coats.

Often enough in recent displays negligees have the appearance of evening gowns or wraps. Those fur-banded ones of chiffon velvet might do double duty and not be found out. But usually lines that are more flowing, extremes in the length of wing sleeves (of lace or other diaphanous material) and finishing touches that are dainty rather than splendid, are points of difference.
