

Joe Tally Calls Run-off In Congressional Race

Joe Tally has announced his intention of calling for a second primary June 28 to challenge the primary attained by Congressman Carlisle May 31 for the seventh N. C. District's Congressional office.

Tally received a majority in five of the seven counties of the district—falling to carry his own home county of Cumberland and Cary's home county of Robeson. The total district vote—officially—was Carlisle, 22,981; Tally, 21,301; Ernest Mayhan, 1,838.

Carlisle's failure to get a majority of the votes rather than a plurality entitled runner-up Tally to ask for the second primary.

Tally said: "The majority of the voters voted against the present Congressman. This confirms my belief that the people of the Seventh District want a change from do-nothing representation."

This referred to the combined vote for Tally and Mayhan as being exclusively protest votes.

"We are not professional politicians," Tally said, "and we made two mistakes in our campaign in the first primary. It will not hurt to admit them. We did not make a determined effort to organize the present congressman's home county of Robeson and we took the Cumberland vote for granted. . . . But those mistakes will not be made again."

Tally's statement reiterated his campaign declarations and referred to "do-nothing representation."
