Southwest Africa

(Prepared by the National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C.)

SOUTHWEST AFRICA, the latest political division of the world to acquire a constitution, was formerly German Southwest Africa, the product of the first of Germany's efforts to obtain a colonial "place in the sun." It was on this huge territorial "bone" that the empire, unused to overseas possessions, cut the teeth of its colonial policy, later used effectively in other parts of the world. Since the World War the region has been under mandate from the League of Nations to the Union of South Africa. The constitution recently granted to the mandated territory was conferred by the parliament of the union and is only the forerunner, according to South African political leaders, of a still broader charter.

Germany became interested in colonies in the eighties of the Nineteenth century after most of the desirable areas in Africa had been staked out by other European powers. Along the Atlantic coast, Southwest Africa (then generally known as Damaraland) was practically the only unappropriated region between the Cape of Good Hope and Gibraltar; and Great Britain looked upon this region even as more or less hazily within her sphere of influence. Undoubtedly it had remained unappropriated largely because of its utterly desolate appearance from the sea. Seeing only its sea aspect one traveler described it as without question, "the least attractive part of Africa, except only the Sahara."

Southwest Africa has an area of 322,400 square miles, and so is two-thirds as large as the four states of the union together. Beginning in the south at the Orange river, it extends northward past the Tropic of Capricorn and on to the southern border of the Portuguese colony of Angola, marked by the Kunene river. The total frontage on the Atlantic is approximately 800 miles, a distance equal to that from the island of Jamaica to central Florida, and in corresponding latitudes. In the north the territory is 620 miles wide, extending inland to within little more than 100 miles of the middle line of the continent. The territory becomes narrower to the south, and at the southern boundary is only 220 miles wide. The most striking and peculiar feature of Southwest Africa as it appears on a map is the long narrow "finger" of territory that extends eastward from the northeast corner. This corridor, only about 30 miles wide, extends for nearly 300 miles to the Zambesi river, which it reaches only a few miles above Victoria falls.

Coastal Desert is Desolate.
Southwest Africa's worst foot, which she puts forward to the Atlantic—the coastal desert—is known as the Namib. Few coast regions of the earth are more desolate. Shallow water, low desert islands, absence of harbors, and a dry, sandy shore, devoid of vegetation, combined to make the region so inhospitable to seamen that they always gave it a wide berth. The sand, mostly blown into dunes, extends inland from ten to forty miles, and the barren, desert character of this strip is marked from the southern boundary for about 600 miles north. The few stream beds that have been worn into the Namib during the ages have water in them only now and then over a long series of years, and when moisture does flow down from the highlands it seldom reaches the sea.

The northern 200 miles of the coast region is only a little less desolate than the Namib. It is more mountainous, less dominated by loose sand, and in a more tropical latitude. The stream beds are better defined and usually support a growth of bushes and trees.

Perhaps once in ten years the Namib receives a drenching rain and demonstrates the magic that nature hides in her drops of water. Verdure springs up all over the parched sands, animals flock in almost overnight, and for a while the former desert teems with game. Soon, however, the sun parches the soil again, the animals disappear, and once more the desert is supreme.

From ten to forty miles inland the desert gives place to a transition belt. Sparse grass and bushes appear on rising ground and afford some pasturage. Immediately beyond is the escarpment of the inland plateau, its edge marked in many places by fantastically piled bowlders.

It is in the upland back of the sandy coastal strip that the worthwhile part of Southwest Africa exists. This region is least promising in the south where the rainfall is scant. But even there, the broad valley of the Fish river and the valleys of its tributaries furnish regions in which thriving communities have sprung up, while much of the dryer land supports flocks of sheep and goats.

The plateau region becomes more and more promising as one journeys northward. In the center of the country 14 inches of rain falls annually. A little farther north 18 and then 18 inches is received; while over most of the northern quarter of the inland region 20 or more inches fall each year.

Has Few Running Streams. One striking thing about Southwest Africa is the lack of running streams
