Value of Turnin Under Legumes Is Pointed Out

An average growth of legumes turned under will add to the soil the equivalent of 500 to 750 pounds of nitrate of soda per acre, or 1,400 to 2,000 pounds of cottonseed meal, reports Prof. C. B. Williams, head of the State College Agronomy Department. This is substantially the same whether the seed are harvested or the entire plant turned under.
"If legumes which have been turned under are plowed under, the organic matter of the soil will be increased by the tons of dry materials turned in, and the nitrogen by about 100 pounds for each ton of dry material (roots, stems, leaves, etc.) added to the soil," Prof. Williams explained.

"This means an addition to the soil of the equivalent of 250 pounds of nitrate of soda, or about 700 pounds of cottonseed meal, for each ton of dry material. A good average growth of legumes turned under should supply at least two or three tons of dry organic matter."
The State College man cited the following results when legume crops are removed from the soil for hay or otherwise: The best that can be done would be to about maintain the original nitrogen reserves of the soil and sustain a loss of the phosphoric acid and potash that would require in the case of soybeans, applications of 50 pounds of 16 per cent superphosphate and 53 pounds of 50 per cent muriate of potash, for each ton of material removed.
The replacements of phosphoric acid and potash required in the case of other legumes removed would not be any less than soybeans, and in most cases more.

Reduction
In 1870 more than half of the gainfully employed people in the United States were farmers, but by 1930 this proportion had fallen to a little more than a fifth.
