THE FLOATING ANGEL.

Conley.
Pearl with pleased expression answered, "Thank you Mr. Forsythe, I will go with you. My heart longs for a drive into the country, and to visit the parks and other places of my childhood once again."
Waverly, with exultant step passed down the walk and entered the highway for the city and Mr. Olivar's, feeling more elated than he had in many days past.

The world took on new glory to him, the song of the wild birds on the still evening air were whispered words of love, answering to the emotions of his own throbbing heart, each bud and flower held in their tiny petals, nectar, never before dreamed of, and his face glowed with a new light as he entered the Olivar home. Bess could not imagine what had happened to her—Mr. Waverly—he was in such higher glee than usual and when she questioned him about it he laughingly replied: "Your papa has given me a week off from work and I've been planning to have some more of our good times together. Tomorrow you and I will walk about the city, and see if we can find anything to amuse us."

His night was peaceful, such as the calm on the ocean, before the hurricane with all its fury strikes its placid waters. Next morning, taking a book he went to a shady nook on the lawn and tried to read, but in vain. He turned the pages listlessly, always seeing a white-robed vision whose pure and stainless soul shone from the sea-blue eyes. He felt relieved when the hands of his watch pointed the time arrived for Bess and him to take their walk. When they were seated at luncheon, Mrs. Olivar ever anxious that he should enjoy himself, asked if he had had a pleasant time at Mr. Ralston's, and how he liked Pearl.

His being slightly thrown off his guard at the unexpected question, he blushed and stammered: "I-I-why-I think she is a charming girl."

When luncheon was over Bess joined him ready for their walk, chatting gaily as they passed down the long avenue of palms taking a street that led into the residential part of the city.

As they leisurely walked by the Townsel residence they were beckoned in by Vinola who was on the lawn feeding some canaries. She met them near the gate saying: "You must come in, I want Bess to hear my new songster warble his plaintive notes of thrilling music, while perhaps you Mr. Forsythe will not be averse to look some new flowering plants I have just received from Spain."

"Indeed, I shall be delighted," replied Waverly.

They walked through the grounds admiring the roses and other flowers and listened to the singing birds, and stopped under a beautiful rose arbor where a small table had been placed, covered with snowy damask and laden with ice cream and delicious cakes of which they all willingly partook.

"This is a pleasure we hadn't anticipated," said Waverly to Vinola, whose face shone radiantly in the warm glow of the afternoon sun.

"Don't mention such a trifle. I was horribly lonesome and only too glad to have your company," she replied with an enchanting smile.

"And while you are taking a vacation I hope to have you and Bess take a short excursion with me out to my country home. We have a lovely lake out there and father has just sent up a launch and we can have some sails."

"I shall soon become very much indebted to you all. Every one seems so kind. But I do not wish you to go to any trouble on my account," said Waverly.

"It will not be any trouble whatever. Consider it settled. I shall call for you and Bess tomorrow afternoon. Mama went out there this morning and I think I shall follow next week and get out of the stifling heat of the city."

An hour soon passed, then bidding Vinola adieu till the morrow they resumed their walk, and just as the sun was bidding good day to the tree tops they returned to Mr. Olivar's, Bess describing to her mother what a lovely time they had had with Vinola.

Vinola called for them next evening at two. Seated behind two dashing black steeds that kept the driver's full attention, they quickly sped down through the wide long streets, and out of the busy turmoil of the city and entered wide stretches of fields, these too were soon passed and a tiny lake was seen in the distance, which grew larger as they rapidly neared it.

"Here we are," said Vinola, as the carriage drew up before a modern bungalow. They alighted and Mrs. Townsel met them. Bess romped and played on the lawn and was as happy as a bird just freed from the cage. "Mother dear, we've come for a sail, and can you find time to join us?" said Vinola with a meaning underlook toward her mother.

"I am very sorry Vinola, but I got your message just a little too late. I had given the boatman permission to go into town, and he will hardly be back before night but perhaps we can get one near," said Mrs. Townsel.

"Oh, no, never mind, I dare say we can find something to entertain us. Mr. Forsythe is taking a vacation and I only wished to help make it pleasant for him. But we will come another time and be sure you keep that boatman in reach for no telling just what hour will bring us out," returned Vinola.

"I am sure Mrs. Townsel, I am going to be spoiled with so many kindnesses heaped upon me," said Waverly.

"I believe the southern people are generally more hospitable than the northern. It is second nature to us, especially when we meet those who seem so worthy as yourself," answered that lady with a look at Waverly could not understand.

Their conversation was interrupted here by Bess who exclaimed as she darted round the corner of the deep portico: "There are swans down on the lake and I want to go and see them."

"Yes, we will go down and feed them some my little friend, and you shall have the joy of seeing them eat from your hand," Vinola answered.

Thus they went to the lake, Bess hurrying thither with her crumbers, while Waverly and Vinola followed more leisurely.

When the sun began to hide himself behind the western hills, they started on their return to the city. "Take us back the east road," said Vinola to the driver, as Waverly assisted her into the carriage. It was a new section of country to Waverly and he was enjoying its passing beauties when he realized he was nearing the south end of Mr. Ralston's plantation where that gentleman had brought him many Sundays ago. His heart beat a little faster and a faint flush rose to his face as he said to Vinola: "I believe I am on your familiar grounds again."

"Yes," replied Vinola, "and that reminds me of a visit I promised Pearl. I do wish we could stop a while, but it is too late."

"Do let us stop just a little minute," pleaded Bess. "Mama says Miss Pearl is as lovely as an angel, and I should like to see her if she is so sweet as that."

"Very well then, but it will have to be a very short call, and you must not be expecting to meet an angel, they do not inhabit these climes," said Vinola, whose face had become somewhat gloomy.

"As they neared the house they saw Pearl on the lawn with basket and scissors clipping a rose here and there, handling them with delicate care. She came to the gate as they halted. Waverly lifted his hat reverently, while Vinola greeted her as an old friend. Making her excuses for not having called and saying she certainly would soon. Vinola motioned the driver to move on, when Waverly, who was only waiting for an opportunity, presented little Bess. Pearl came up close to the carriage and took the little outstretched hand in hers as she said:

"I am so glad to meet you. I am sure we would soon become good friends, but I do wish you would all come in a while."

"Not this time," answered Vinola, "but can't you give us a bouquet from your lovely selection?"

Ah! they are treasures I am always glad to bestow on friends," Pearl replied as she carefully selected two huge bouquets and handed to Vinola and Bess, and after a pause she gave Waverly a half blown white rose, saying laughingly as she did: "Gentlemen do not need many flowers."

"No," he replied, then in an undertone, "I would not exchange this one for all the flowers in the garden," and aloud to Pearl, "Miss Ralston, if convenient with you, I shall come tomorrow afternoon to make our drive as I agreed."

"Certainly, I shall be ready," she replied, as a wave of pleasure mantled her fair cheek.

Then they drove on and Vinola soon bade Waverly and Bess good bye at Mr. Olivar's.
