She shut herself up for a long time after this, in peculiarly close seclusion, keeping away from all those she had known. The Arroyo ladies she naturally avoided most. Thus it resulted that she knew nothing of Walter's departure for the United States. Her sincere effort to do right in this struggle with herself remained. was shown in her never making inquiries for him. It was only by accident that she learned of it, and after that, the two older sisters, her companions, began to report that they feared her health would give out, and urged her forth to take nore exercise. Then she occasionally came again to

"Amiguita, there are some Sisters of Charity over there, or sisters of some kind or other," said he to her. "You have a great deal of respect for them, have you not, though the government treats them so roughly?" "Yes, indeed I have," replied the woman, sturdily.

"And you would like to hold some improving conversation with them. would you not?"

"Yes, I would like that, too; but they can't be expected to pay much attention to such as I."

"I think it would have a good effect upon your soul's salvation. I am so anxious to have you enjoy this benefit that I will give half a dollar if you will go and select the handsome young Sister sitting on the bench yonder at the door of the chapter house and engage her in talk for ten minutes. I will double the amount if you make it fifteen."

"They have no worldly ideas. Well, you are a forward one, you are."

"That's it, that's it; I see you understand what I mean," in a hearty, confidential way. "This is a perfectly straight affair."

Sheddan at West Point.

It is good to give the bad boys another, chance. General Sheridan, when he was a West Point cadet, committed an offense so flagrant against the discipline of the school that he afterward thought himself that it ought not to have been forgiven. On parade one day his sen geant, who was also a cadet, ordered him to "dress," that is, to stand in line with the rest of the company.

It was a proper order; but young Sheridan, who had a very fiery Irish temper basket with epistolary attempts before he took exception to the tone in which it was given, and, in fact, was so incensed at it that he rushed toward the sergeant with his bayonet in his hand, intending to assault him. Fortunately, before he could accomplish his purpose, his reason regained the upper hand, and he returned to his place.

The sergeant reported the offence, a proceeding which inflamed Sheridan's wrath anew, and the next time he met the sergeant he flew at him with his fists. They fought until they were separated by an officer.

Here was a fearful breach of military discipline, one which at most military academies would have been punished by dismissal. But the officers, lenient toward the earnest student of 20 years, -- "too lenient," he thought,--instead of expelling him gave him another chance by rusticating him for a year. But for this the services of Sheridan would have been lost to the country during the late war, when his peculiar and very great talents were of ine-timable value.

His experience at West Point did not lessen his sense of the necessity of discipline. He knew when to forgive offenders, and when to enforce military law. In his Memoirs he tells us what he did with four officers who displayed criminal cowardice at the battle of Stone's River :

"When their guilt was clearly established, and as soon as an opportunity occurred, I caused the whole division to be formed into a hollow square, closed in mass, and had the four officers marched to the center, where, telling them that I would not humiliate any officer or soldier by requiring him to touch their disgraced swords, I compelled them to deliver theirs up to my colored servant, who also cut from their coats every insignia of rank.

"Then, after there had been read to the command an order from army headquarters dismissing the four from the service, the scene was brought to a close by drumming the cowards out of camp. It was a mortifying spectacle, but from that day no officer in that division ever abandoned his colors."

In the case of Cadet Sheridan, the authorities at West Point were the more inclined to leniency because they saw in him the stuff out of which a good soldier is made-love of his calling, and great energy in preparing himself for it, Not a few of the "bad boys" at school are had from having too much of the vivaci.y and resolution that conquer the world, which only need to be rightly guided to bring them fame.

rumors of revolution came from the north. The pilgrimage church of El Jasmin had a few arches remaining of what had once been a beautiful sculptured gateway. It had perhaps been established where it was as a counteracting influence to pes-tilent local superstitions, and especially to the worship of a serpent idol in a large cave near there. It stood on a gentle rise of ground, facing the plaza, and there was attached to it a chapter house, or kind of sacred hostelry, for the accommodation of pilgrim guests. with Beatriz a little into the village street. The men of the village were highly respectful to all those who wore the insignia of pilgrimage, and most of the women and girls were taking part in it themselves.

Don Walter took up a lodging in a wattled hut, furnished only with a few place in the center, and slept on mats like any peasant. For some reason, the religious observances were much better attended this year than usual. Delegations of Indians, in their distinctive local dress, were present from a number of remote points. Walter prowled among them, looking from a distance at his nearest friends and connections, like one from the dead. He came inadvertently upon Amy and Beatriz face to face, as they were issuing together from behind the sculptured arches. Changed though he was by long exposure in the canyon and by his disguise, Dona Beatriz recognized him at once. "Don Walter!" she exclaimed, with an impulsive cry. "Don Walter, it is you?" "I call myself Ignacio Gomez. There is some mistake here. I am in search of cattle that have strayed in these parts,"

he responded, endeavoring to retreat. "No, no, you are Don Walter; I cannot be mistaken. You have not gone to the north; you are here and in hiding. Perhaps you are in trouble and danger. Oh, can I not help you?"
