PP The Hermit of the Grandfather.

By WILLIAM S. PEARSON.

CHAPTER VI.

THE HERMIT'S STORY. Gordon had the virtue of hospitality and with his own hands prepared the evening meal.

This dispatched, the party with pipes lit repaired to the Eastern front of the great mountain and witnessed the rising of the full moon. Stretched on the heather and looking out on the vast sea of uminous mist in front the young men heard Gordon tell the promised story as follows:

"It was on a dark rainy night in the fall of 1864," he said, "that Squire Bill Estis, a native here, and as good a Union man as breathes the breath of life, came to my cabin with six halt starved wretches, who had escaped from Salisbury prison pen and were making their way to the Federal lines in East Tennessee.

"One of those men was Captain Lee, of New York-Henry Gordon Lee was his name-the same man who gave me among other mementoes the handkerchief found by you gentlemen on the lawn at Linville.

"Two of the party died at my cabin and are buried under the chimney like cliffs I pointed out to you on our way to this place. Lee had a long spell of fever in the basement of my house-I call it the Shoe-and for a long while balanced between this world and the next, if there is any next.

"I fed him on corn whiskey milk and Estis' wife dosed him with sweating teas till we brought him around and never fellow was more grateful. By the time he was able to walk I had safely forwarded the surviving members of his party under Estis' pilotage to the union lines, and still indisposed to travel he begged to be allowed a home with me till the war should

"With the help of some Union women who live lower down the mountain, he was clad in the homespun jeans of the country and passed himself off on the few people he chanced to see in these parts, then very remote, as a brother of mine, whose home was in Tennessee. Of course it seemed strange to me that he should not want to go home, when he was once recovered of the fever, and making bold to ask him once why this was, he told me with breaking heart and shaking nerves that though a married man and the reputed father of a child he could call no spot on earth home; that the roof tree had been ruined, and and by the hand of her whom it was planted to shelter. He said, and unfortunately perhaps for me agree with him, that if he had loved a dog it would have proven faithful; but as it was a woman

she was false." "Pardon me," interrupted Baskerville, "but you were both wrong, calumniously wrong, since every day's papers teem with deeds of this very dog faithfulness that you so much vaunt, performed by women. Is it not true, Mr.

"Pardon me, young man!" said the Hermit, "we will not argue that or any other difference. I have a reason for telling you and your friend here a very sad story of the wreck of a brave man's life and would wish to see you profit by it. I would much like to do a passing good and this seems to have met me in the way." "To continue, then," said old Gordon, "I will pass over the broken hints my dear friend threw out concerning the new Heavens and new Earth that opened up aflong absent, perhaps dead, friend friend's history. Go on!" give you the name of his en-
