The writer was offered a chance last Thursday which he glad ly accepted, to visit the Blue Ridge Pinnacle. The start was made from here on the 1:27 train Thursday, Sept. 27th. In a short time we reached Round Knob, where we left the railroad for a rougher one. We got a pack horse at Round Knob, and about 4 p. m. we started. The road for about three miles is up Mill Creek, the north fork of Catawba River. Then the climbing commences, and it is one steady climb for about two miles. But about 5:45 a. m. we finally reached the very top, and despite the cold, the hard climb and the darkness, the view, even before sunrise, was worth all the trouble. The Pinnacle stands up alone, with no peak closer than Mt. Mitchell to obstruct the view, which is indeed a magnificent one. Just before sunrise the picture was a grand one in blue. All the harsh outlines were softened, and as far as the eye could reach, the panorama was interesting and pleasing. As the time for sunrise approached, the blue picture commenced turning silver, and when the great round red disk did get above the horizon line, the silver turned to gold and one felt that
