The Great Pasteur

Never Saw Chile's Nitrate Desert, But...

His bacterial research, which gave his name to the pasteurization process, provided the basis for one of the widely accepted explanations of Chilean Nitrate's origin.

Vast beds of Natural Nitrate in Chile's desert region are natural deposits—enough to last hundreds of years—one of the oldest and best known fertilizer materials. Mystery of their origin long has challenged science. Many theories have developed.

Some say prehistoric plants were "nitrified" by bacteria in the soil. That's what Pasteur's work suggested. Others say they are decayed vegetation.

There is a belief the nitrate beds are droppings of billions of birds. Another, that electricity formed them through centuries of violent storms. Some think the beds are rotted rocks; some think they are a crust pushed up from underneath.

Perhaps the right theory com-bins parts of all of them. Who knows? But there is one point on which all agree: Chilean Nitrate of Soda was created by tremendous natural processes. It is completely natural... the only natural nitrate in the world.

Because of its natural origin, Chilean Nitrate of Soda contains, in addition to nitrogen and sodium, small amounts of boron, iodine, manganese, copper,—34 elements in all—many of which are essential to healthy plant growth.

Yes, a hundred years of research and experience agree on the importance of Chilean Nitrate's natural qualities and their outstanding performance in continued profitable farming.
