"They don't tend to be administrators or tenured faculty. We want that to change."

A major project for the Human Relations committee is holding the first-ever Human Relations Summit later this fall, vice president Donnell Phillips said. She said Battle had had the committee renamed from a race relations or minority concerns committee. "There's a lot more issues besides race," she said. "There's no question that the University is socially segregated. It's time we stop talking about it and do something about it."

The Executive Projects committee is working on holding a liberal arts festival that would involve all of Chapel Hill and Carboro, according to Co-secretary Dillon people, which would in turn push taxes up. Also, N.C. law prohibits cohabitation and homosexuality, he said. "I don't know how they can do that," he said Thursday night. "I mean, it's against the law."

Webb said it was also a moral issue. "We're against it morally. We believe God judges the town, individuals and whoever wants it... it will be a judgement on our community."

Webb was disappointed that he hadn't received any acknowledgment to his letter and said he would go to Tuesday's hearing. But Webb was not optimistic about the chances of halting the proposal.

Susan Johnston, a lesbian mother and concerned advocate for the plan, will attend Tuesday's meeting, too. She said the issue of equality for domestic partners hit home. When her partner of 17 years quit her main job and had to take on a part-time job, she had to buy private insurance, which cost $400.

Johnston said treating employees equally and letting persons who were not married buy health insurance for themselves and their domestic partners would not only be beneficial financially.
