voters. Instead, he spent time Monday and today putting up signs at all the polls as well as appearing at some polls. He also visited county stores Monday to talk to voters one-on-one. "It is up to the voters at this point," Crowther said. "Voters are in control, and candidates have to recognize the power of the vote rather than the power of campaigning in all elections."

Bill Apple, a candidate for sheriff, plans on staying home and watching television tonight until the vote is calculated.

In his last-minute campaigning, Apple replaced some stolen signs and made sure there were representatives at the polls. He said he planned to appear at as many polls as possible on election day. "I think 10 to 20 percent of the people are undecided going in, and last-minute efforts may sway some of those votes," Apple said.

All campaigning is important, Hobbs said. He was preparing for today's elections by making sure representatives were at the polls. Also, Hobbs and his staff talked to supporters on the phone and in person. "We can't win alone on last-minute campaigning," Hobbs said. "It's important to get people to vote, and we won't stop until 7:30."

Most people have made up their minds by now. The challenge is to get people to the polls to vote, he said.

Richard Hammer, a candidate for Orange County commissioner, said one thing he didn't like about politics was campaign strategies. "If I'm elected it's because of what I stand for, and the people know it."

PUBLIC HOUSING

need to provide a good place to live."

Public housing is allotted $1,048,000 annually in the town budget, said Chapel Hill Town Manager Cal Horton. These funds cover many expenses, Horton said.

"This budget goes to maintaining buildings and providing for collection of rent," he said. "It is for all of the things involved in managing an apartment building." There are 336 units in 13 different public housing complexes in Chapel Hill, Horton said.

One of the major problems facing public housing today is a lack of organization, Shirer said. "Each year the council sets goals to work towards," she said.

One of the goals of the council this year is to bring the community together, Shirer said. "The community is not organized," she said. "Organizing the community will be a hard job. People don't want to come out."

confusion across the state."

The committee discussed groups that could be approached in the search for funding, Cole said. He said possible target groups included the black community in the Chapel Hill-Carrboro area and former students of Stone. Stone was an associate professor in the curriculum of African-American studies until her death in 1991.

The BCC has a strong base of support both inside and outside of UNC, McCormick said. "We have a committed group of distinguished people outside the University who will help us raise this money," he said. "We have a unified commitment within the University as well."

At the beginning of the meeting, four of the five campaign leaders met with University leaders to discuss possible strategies for approaching potential donors.

The four campaign leaders present were Maya Angelou, Dean Smith, Bob Eubanks and Jack Tate. Deloris Jordan, also a campaign leader, was unable to attend due to a case of strep throat, McCormick said.

Afterward, the campaign leaders and the larger special gifts committee joined in a luncheon meeting. McCormick said that at the meeting they watched presentations by students about current BCC projects, including Communiversity and the Cross Cultural Communications Institute.

ELECTIONS

We intend to work to provide the people of the 16th District with the best representative government possible," Hobbs said.

Little, also a Southern Pines resident, said education was one of her main concerns.

She served on the Moore County Board of Education for eight years and was a teacher before becoming a private business owner.

Voters also will be responsible for choosing two judges to sit on the N.C. Supreme Court.

These races have not been widely publicized because these candidates, like all judicial candidates in North Carolina, are prohibited from talking about issues during the campaign.

In the first race, former N.C. Supreme Court Justice I. Beverly Lake is running against the woman who ousted him two years ago.

Sarah Parker, a Charlotte lawyer and current state Supreme Court justice, beat Lake when they ran against each other for the same seat in 1992.

Lake, a former state senator, is a Republican and Parker is a Democrat.

In the other race for a seat on the N.C. Supreme Court, incumbent Republican Bob Orr is being challenged by Jim Fuller, a Democratic lawyer from Raleigh.

Two seats on the N.C. Court of Appeals are also up for grabs.

In the first race, Republican Mark Martin is trying to unseat incumbent Democrat Elizabeth McCrodden.

McCrodden, a former assistant attorney general, was appointed by Gov. Hunt to the Court of Appeals. She is the only woman on the court.

Martin is serving as a Superior Court judge after having been appointed by former Gov. Martin.

In the other Court of Appeals race, Republican candidate Ralph Walker is looking to return to the Court of Appeals, where he briefly served before being defeated in 1992.

He has 22 years of civil and criminal court experience as a trial lawyer, and he has served for 10 years as a judge on the Family and Superior courts.

Walker's opponent, Charlotte lawyer Sydnor Thompson, will reach mandatory retirement age in 1996.

If elected, Thompson would be replaced then by a governor-appointed judge who would serve an additional full term.

Voters in Orange County will be choosing Superior Court judges even though there is not a seat up for election in this district.

Until a recent decision by a U.S. District Court, Superior Court judges were chosen in a statewide election rather than just in the district over which they will preside.

This year, because of the ruling, individual districts will choose their own judges.

However, since the ruling could still be appealed, the votes will still be taken in Orange County for judges in other districts.
