

Students Sacrifice Extra Sleep to Clean Up for Charity

BY MICHELLE CRAMPTON

On a typical Saturday morning, most students don't voluntarily get up at 9 a.m. to do manual labor. But this Saturday, some students did just that.

In an attempt to aid those suffering from hunger and homelessness, to provide service to the local community, and to promote awareness on campus, HOPE, the Hunger and Homelessness Outreach Project, sponsored the University's seventh annual Hunger Cleanup.

HOPE worked with the National Student Campaign Against Hunger and Homelessness in the 11th annual national event.

The Hunger Cleanup was organized as a work-a-thon in which volunteers worked at nine local sites including the Chapel Hill Senior Center, Hargraves Center and Phillips Middle School. Volunteers painted, cleaned and did garden work, and one group even tore down a past-its-prime bridge.

Volunteers received pledges and donations for their work that were divided between the national campaign and the Inter-Faith Council's homeless shelter. Groups involved in the event included Pi Beta Phi sorority, Mu Beta Psi, Phi Sigma Pi, Circle K and a group of Hinton James resident assistants.

The event, which had its largest turnout at UNC ever with about 60 students, raised about $500.

The opening ceremony, which was held outside the Campus Y, featured guest speaker Holli Levinson from the "Empty the Shelter" organization in Atlanta.

Levinson told the workers before they reported to their sites that it was important to recognize that tough issues could not be ignored by students.

"As students, sometimes we think it's not about us and that it's about other people," Levinson said. "But it's not that way. The issues of homelessness and poverty are really very much connected to us and the community."

Cindy Toms, a junior from Cary and co-chairwoman of HOPE, said the event was very good at fulfilling many goals at once.

"Our goals were to educate the campus and community and as many volunteers as we can get about homelessness and the social agencies and programs that are around Chapel Hill every day," Toms said. "It also raises money for hunger and homelessness."

In addition, the Hunger Cleanup provided needed services to local organiza-

Bill Could Make Towns Pay for Rezoned Land

BY LAURA GODWIN

A bill in the N.C. house that could change the way local municipalities regulate property use has area residents and town officials up in arms about the future of land development.

House Bill 597 is referred to as a "takings" bill. If passed by the House, the bill would require towns to pay landowners for possible monetary loss if the towns decided to "downzone" land.

Downzoning occurs when the town restricts the use of the property, as in the case of commercial zone land being changed to residential zone land. "It's a very complicated plan," Carrboro Town Manager Bob Morgan said.

"Basically, as I understand it, if the town were to downzone a piece of property, we would have to compensate the owner for that," he said.

The proposed legislation would also require towns to pay landowners if downzoning conflicted with their future plans for the land.

"I think it (the bill) would make it ex-

Race Relations Week to Open Dialogue

BY JILL DUNCAN

Race Relations Week, sponsored by Students for the Advancement of Race Relations, will begin today with a dialogue/diversity workshop.

SARR Co-chairman Mike McWilliams said the purpose of Race Relations Week was to get students interested in race relations and to work through some of the prejudices and stereotypes.

"Race relations is a topic many people are concerned with, but it is a sensitive issue," McWilliams said. "Few people actually confront their own beliefs in that issue."

The dialogue/diversity workshop will be held today to allow students to discuss race relations at the University and in society at large.

"The workshops provide a structure in which students can talk about being a member of a religious, racial or any group that has caused them disrespect," McWilliams said.

He said SARR had been holding similar workshops throughout the year. He said attendance had ranged from 15 to 50 people.

Questions that usually come up during the workshops include what students take pride in within their group, what is different about their group, what misconceptions students would like to clear up about their group and how students' ideologies have changed since arriving at UNC.

The N.C. Student Teach and Reach program, in which University students visit local middle schools and facilitate discussion about various race-related subjects, will hold a training session Tuesday. It hopes to start training students now for the fall semester, he said.

McWilliams said he was hoping for a big crowd at the forum on interracial dating Wednesday. Spike Lee's "Jungle Fever" will be shown.

Women Hit Gridiron to Raise Funds

Female InterVarsity Christian Fellowship members did an odd thing to tackle their fund-raising problems: they played a good, old-fashioned, smash 'em up game of football.

The first IV Women's Tackle Football Tournament was held at Culbreth Middle School from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday. Proceeds from a raffle and a T-shirt sale associated with the event will be used to give members scholarships for their annual summer retreat at Windy Gap Camp near Asheville.

Women from the four chapters on campus formed three teams and played a round-robin tournament. The Granville Chapter emerged as the victor, defeating South Chapter in the final game.

Granville, South, and North/Mid Chapter teams held practices to prepare for the event, with the male IV members coaching the women.

Paul Holloman, a sophomore from Charlotte who coached the Granville Chapter, said he was pleased with the win but also said that winning was secondary; he was just glad that everyone had a good time.

Conference Extols Value of Teaching

BY JULIE CORBIN
ASSISTANT UNIVERSITY EDITOR

The first Chapman Faculty Fellows Conference, held Saturday, sparked discussion about the responsibilities of faculty to their students.

The keynote address was delivered by Robert Coles, professor at Harvard University and at Duke University's Center for Documentary Studies. The topic of Coles' speech was "Teaching as Public Service."

Coles touched on his experiences as an undergraduate at Harvard University, and he asserted that high intelligence did not necessarily mean high moral standards. He also spoke about the need for students to broaden their education through experiences outside the classroom.

"Coles was just remarkable," said Rachel Willis, a lecturer in economics.

Joy Kasson, professor of American studies, and Chuck Stone, professor of journalism and mass communication, responded to Coles.

Following the keynote address, three panel discussions took place.

The first panel discussion was "The Value of Teaching and the Teaching of Values."

The afternoon panel discussion focused on the topic of "Teaching the Arts and Humanities Is a Public Service."

Joel Schwartz, professor of political science, said the ideas generated during this part of the conference were the highlights of the day.

The topic produced a discussion among those attending about poor critical thinking skills in students, as well as about faculty incentives to choose teaching over research.

Schwartz said students were unable to learn the thinking and
