

Lesbian Group Aims to Empower Members

One of the benefits of being a student at UNC is the wide array of free academic services offered by the University. Unfortunately, many students do not realize that the University goes well beyond the academic realm to keep students at their peak.

The University Counseling Center, located in Nash Hall, is one of the helpful outlets exclusive to students seeking assistance with regards to personal or social issues.

The Lesbian Empowerment Group is one of several groups available to students through the Counseling Center. Created in the fall of 1994, lesbian students attending UNC are now able to receive professional counseling if they so desire.

Doctors Tracey Gersh and Maureen Windle are the residing psychologists at the Center, and they serve as the co-facilitators of the Empowerment group.

Gersh and Windle said they could see how non-lesbians might be skeptical of the term empowerment; however, their intention was to make the group's members realize that they were not part of an obscure and voiceless minority.

"In choosing the name we wanted to stay away from calling it a support group because this implies you have a weakness," Windle said. "We want the members to feel empowered, and this in itself should not be seen as offensive."

Windle also recognized the fact that some males tend to be egotistic when it comes to issues concerning lesbians. "I don't know why some men are so homophobic," Windle said. "Lesbians do not hate males. This is one of the big misconceptions that many men have."

Withstanding more than their share of negatively imposed sentiment, lesbians continue to press forward and gain support from each other through their collective gatherings. Both Gersh and Windle said that the lesbian students attending the meetings were very responsive to the program.

During group meetings the students are encouraged to express any concerns or opinions they may have both on a personal level and in matters relating to the functioning of the gatherings.

This freedom to be able to individually direct the course of each session lends a special uniqueness to the group and sets it apart from other counseling formats.

Gersh and Windle believed that by acting as facilitators, rather than exacting counselors, the beneficial feeling of empowerment will be placed in the hands of the participants.

The weekly gatherings are held on Tuesdays between 3:20 and 4:50 p.m. in Nash Hall. "The meetings are open to all graduate and undergraduate students," Gersh said. "Right now we have about a dozen members in the group and most come to each meeting."

No matter how enticing this group format may appear to some, there will always be certain individuals seeking private counseling.

"It's not unusual for someone attending a meeting for the first time to be reluctant with the group setting," Gersh said. "It may be the first time they've discussed their personal feelings beyond immediate family and friends."

In an attempt to provide for every individual's needs, the Center does offer personal counseling through either Gersh or Windle. All students who do not feel ready to enter the group — or who are dealing with issues which they would prefer to keep anonymous — are able to make a personal appointment in Nash Hall.

In a perfect world the prejudice and discrimination that often cause the formation of groups like the Counseling Center's would not exist. But the prospects of that seem dubious.

"We've come a long way in our awareness of different minorities, and in an ideal world we would not need these groups," Gersh said. "But I don't see that happening in my lifetime."

FINANCE

fore congress to request funds, and they said they were acting in good faith. "We have not lied before this body," Reid said. The committee's decision means the $4,000 allocated to the CAA in October will be returned to the general reserve and the $3,500 of student government funds remaining in the CAA's account will be frozen until next year. The CAA will have to function on the $20,000 remaining in their SAFO account.

Rep. Steve Oljeski, Dist. 4, and Holland said they were not satisfied with the committee's decisions, because they felt Reid and Walsh deliberately misled congress. "I am not even close to being through yet," Oljeski said.

Oljeski and Holland said they would file a complaint with the undergraduate Attorney General alleging that Reid and Walsh lied to congress about the athletic department funds in their account.

After the meeting, Reid said he felt the committee's actions were based on a personal bias against him and Walsh, saying "I feel attacked by certain members of the finance committee who appear to hold in higher esteem personal grudges against myself and Ian Walsh than they do their duties as officers of the finance committee."

HORNE

Associate Provost Marilyn Yarborough said.

"(The departments) made a decision based on material already sent," Yarborough said.

History Professor Genna Rae McNeil said her committee was considering hiring Horne because of his range of expertise.

"He has a good reputation," McNeil said. "Several members of the history department are familiar with his work and are looking forward to his visit."

Because Horne has been in Africa for the better part of the year, this trip gives him the opportunity to meet members of the University community and members of the three departments, McNeil said.

"(The meeting) is an informal opportunity for the scholar to meet with other faculty members and students and raise any questions he or she has about the (history) department," McNeil said.

Horne said he was interested in the professorships because he wanted to make a contribution to UNC.

"I'm sure I could contribute to already strong departments, and that's what I would hope to do," he said.

Horne said he had been following the fund-raising problems of the free-standing BCC. The University's Development Office, which is in charge of fund-raising for the free-standing center, has raised only $1.8 million of the $7 million needed for construction.

"Hopefully we can turn the tap (of funding) back on," Horne said. "Some leadership can make a difference."

The history department's tenure committee will consider information in Horne's presentation when it makes its decision. The committee will send its final recommendation to the provost's office, McNeil said.

"The committee has the responsibility to consider the scholarship, teaching and service of any individual (considered by) the department," McNeil said.

The Board of Trustees and the Board of Governors must review the recommendations of all three departments before the appointments are approved.

Horne said he did not know how long the University's process of approving his appointments to the African and Afro-American studies curriculum and the Communication Studies Department would take.

He also said he did not know how long the history department would need to decide whether or not to recommend him for a professorship.

"You probably know better than I do. I'm thousands of miles away," he said.

Horne will talk about his research Monday at 3 p.m. in 569 Hamilton Hall. His presentation will be followed by a question-and-answer session with faculty and students.
