pies that seat will be the person who has the support of the voting people," she said. In a press release, Zaffron called the public debate concerning his credibility as an elected official that resulted from the charge an "educational experience." "Two opinions, however, were universal: continued confidence in my ability to effectively represent the interests of Carboro's citizens," he stated. "The interests of the democratic process would be ill served by denying the right of citizens of all viewpoints to express their opinions at the polls." Alderman Diana McDuffee said she was pleased with Zaffron's announcement. "I'm delighted," she said. "Alex has a lot of supporters. I've been one of the people who has been urging him not to resign. He really deserves to be on the board." Zaffron stated the March 26 election would be a challenge, but also a chance to emphasize the platform he ran on in November. "This election will also provide an opportunity for our community to reaffirm its tradition of reasoned discussion of issues and appealing to our best instincts in making community decisions," he said.

imagine if students feel there is a problem, it would be in getting issues to the student body president and not from the student body president to me," he said. Frederic Schroeder, Jean of students, said there was always room for improvement in building an opportunity for relating student concerns. "There is no such thing as a universal student concern," Schroeder said. "One of the difficulties is in sorting through what is important for the student body as a whole. We must be aware that many of the issues the student body president is relating are not really simple kinds of issues, but issues that will take time in coming up with solutions." Edith Wiggins, interim vice chancellor for student affairs, meets weekly with the student body president and said this meeting was contact she treasured. "I see these meetings as an opportunity for two-way communication between the administration and the students," Wiggins said. "The meetings are a time to hear student concerns and a time to bounce off my ideas on things I may be looking to develop and see what (the student body president) feels is good for the student body." Michael Farmer, a candidate for student body president, said one way he would improve conveying student concerns would be to create a webpage on the Internet that students could access. "We can take the goings-on of Suite C (to the page) and, at the same time, take student concerns to the administration." Farmer said he planned to work with student groups. "We will hear things in our daily interactions with students," he said. "The students in the cabinet are not any different. They are students also, and we will talk with them about what is going on with them and their friends and associates and take that directly to the administration." Student body president candidate Sean Behr said students needed to unify the communication for student concerns and interests. "Through increased communication among students, we can best illuminate the concerns of students and then communicate those concerns," he said. "For every minute that I would spend with the administration conveying concerns, I would like to spend two minutes talking with students." Behr said the first step he would take would be getting input on what issues were important. Behr said he would also provide more instances for students, faculty and administration to get together outside of offices. "Interaction doesn't have to be through meetings or in offices, but through social interaction or service (projects)," he said. "This will improve the intellectual climate but also will help student concerns if the chancellor and others get to know us as students, as people." Behr said he would also push the chancellor and members of the BOT to be open to students.

"I would plan a 'more-than-me' approach to the administration," said Lee Conner, another candidate for student body president. "It is important that the student body president get as many people through the doors of South Building when conveying student concerns. When the student body president goes to the chancellor, he needs to take leaders of the organizations involved in the issues to go with him." Conner said in some cases it was not possible to bring other students, so he would gauge student opinion beforehand. Student body president candidate Aaron Nelson said he wanted to encourage students to get involved. He said he would continue the Student Advisory Committee to the Chancellor and start the Student Advisory Committee to the Board of Trustees. "This would encourage interaction between the Board of Trustees and students so we can convey our concerns to those entrusted to care for us," Nelson said. He said he would also establish the University Council to unite Faculty Council, Employee Forum, student government and the University Administrative Council. "The problem is there is no communication among all these different groups," he said. "Each of these (groups) would send representatives to the University Council to have open and forthright discussion of issues that affect students. To meet the intellectual climate, we need to define it. To me, it is open discussion among people about important issues."

Think back over all your classes at UNC... Which professors have influenced you the most? Who has kept you awake during your 8:00? Who has really made you think, gone above and beyond the call of duty, influenced you to change your major, influenced you NOT to change your major? Take a few minutes to give back to that professor or TA and nominate him or her for the Students' Undergraduate Teaching Awards.

Nomination forms available in the Union, Davis, or Undergrad Libraries and are due by 5 p.m. Friday, February 16.
