early to know how Barnes' withdrawal will affect the election. Hackney said he did not plan to change his campaign strategy.

Republican candidate Dan Buedel had not heard about Barnes' announcement until contacted by The Daily Tar Heel.

"Obviously, that changes it a little bit," he said. "Any election still goes to the best person for the job."

The other Republican candidate, Tracy Fowler of Pittsboro, said he thought the district Democratic Party was well-funded enough to promote any new candidate. "They have a lot of money to get the name out," he said. "(Barnes) was entrenched. It's still going to be a tough race."

UNC student and Natural Law Party candidate Rifkin Young said Barnes' withdrawal breathed new life into his campaign.

"I'm hoping a lot of people who voted for her will consider voting for the Natural Law Party," he said. "It's a little more drive for me (to campaign)."

"I'm psyched."

ate action.

Lassena Sperlock, a sophomore international studies and economics major, said she disagreed with Clinton's actions.

"Clinton has waffled too much on foreign policy. Nobody respects him because he has no foreign policy," Sperlock said.

"I don't like Saddam Hussein, but what right do we have to invade in international affairs?"

Dan Thompson, a junior economics major, said keeping up morale was more important than possible political implications.

"I feel it's important that we support American troops regardless of our feelings toward President Clinton."

county and assist in a wide variety of tasks, she said.

"(The students) do a whole range of things: from playing the piano to helping out in the art room to clerical work," she said.

Bailey said the response to the program from teachers and volunteers has been positive.

"We get many comments saying 'This person is wonderful,'" she said.

Rosemary Edgerton, a reading coordinator at Frank Porter Graham Elementary School, said the volunteers helped to strengthen the goals of her reading program.

"Some of the parents can't get to reading with their children," Edgerton said.

"The volunteers help fill that void."

"The whole experience has been really positive for me. You meet some really wonderful people," she said.

Another important aspect of the volunteer program is relieving some of the teachers' workload, Edgerton said. She said the volunteers added to the learning process after the school day is over.

"(The volunteers) are an extension of me and the parents during the school day," she said.

Betsy Booth, a family specialist at Estes Hills Elementary School, said the students were crucial to the survival of her after school tutoring program.

"We wouldn't be able to run our program without them since we don't have enough funds," she said. "This program is a great thing."

The student volunteers also benefit from the experience.

Heather Massengale, a sophomore education major from Charlotte, said she learned from her students.

"It just reinforces the fact that you can make a difference," she said.

Having seen the positive results of her work with the students, Massengale said she planned to volunteer with the program again.

"I really made a difference and I had a great time," she said. "At the beginning of the year they had a lot of questions and at the end of the year they knew what they were doing."

"It was really neat."

get out of control, the extra expense of being located on Franklin Street is balanced by being located in such a highly traveled area.

"We talked about opening at Eastgate or in a mall, but the foot traffic was what we wanted, so the prices on Franklin Street are worth it."

Merchants in neighboring Durham can take advantage of college foot traffic at lower costs than their Franklin Street counterparts. Ninth Street in Durham, located within walking distance from Duke University, has many shops and restaurants similar to those of Franklin Street.

John Valentine, co-owner of Regulator Bookshop located on Ninth Street, said rental prices on Franklin Street are about 30 percent higher than those of Ninth Street.

"Ninth Street is like Franklin Street was 15 years ago," Valentine said. "What's happened on Franklin Street is that as landlords look for franchises and brand names like The Gap, they price out the smaller, funkier businesses."

"It's tough because the high overheads make it almost impossible for someone who has a dream of opening a clothing store or restaurant," he said.

Valentine said the diversification of businesses has also been eroded in Durham.

"In the early '80s even Ninth Street had a wider variety of stores and opportunities than it does now," Valentine said.

Joel Harper, president of the Chapel Hill-Carrboro Chamber of Commerce, said he has not received an unusual amount of complaints from business owners regarding the cost of rent on Franklin Street.

Harper said the rent rates for business space on Franklin Street ranges from a low of $21 to a high of $25 per square foot.

"The few complaints I've gotten have typically been not so much from existing businesses but from people looking to bring businesses here," he said.

"They might say that the price is too high or that it's higher than they thought," he said. "But, you can tell from the lack of vacancies that there are plenty of people willing to pay."

There is significant turnover of small businesses on Franklin Street, Harper said. However the turnover is no worse than in similar areas. "Being a small business is tough, period — no matter where you are."
