

Hayes contends, Hunt stresses issues

Hayes contrasts himself with Hunt, emphasizing his background and charging his opponent with failing in education.

Robin Hayes' campaign speeches and advertisements stress that "12 years is long enough." The Republican gubernatorial candidate said he could not be more different from his running mate, incumbent Gov. Jim Hunt.

"Here's a guy who is a career politician and, in contrast, I'm a small-business man," Hayes said.

Hayes, who spent his last term in the N.C. House as Majority Whip, said he had basically come into politics from the outside.

"I've put my whole life out on the table and have told people to examine me on the issues; I've said exactly how I'll change government in North Carolina."

Though Hayes is strongly pushing for safer streets, reducing government regulation and taxes and strengthening North Carolina's families, he said improving education is "head and shoulders above the rest."

"There's no way we can gloss over how poorly we're doing in North Carolina," he said. "Something is badly wrong with education; we don't need more programs, we need leadership."

If elected, Hayes said he would first get politics out of state personnel. "I would bring the size of government down by making it more efficient and effective," he said.

"I don't need a political machine, I just need to contribute to the state."

Hayes opposes abortion and advocates tougher crime control and cutting taxes, including getting rid of the food tax.

As a member of the House, Hayes serves as co-chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Human Resources.

He is also chairman of the Prison Fellowship of North Carolina.

Hayes said he wasn't trying to make a name for himself in politics. "I'm running to make a difference for North Carolina. The things that I stand for people care about."

He also acknowledged the influence of his parents and grandparents, who set up a foundation for the state's industry through Cannon Mills.

"I'm proud of them and what they've done for North Carolina," Hayes said. "This is my opportunity to continue their service and what they've done for the state."

Gubernatorial candidate ROBIN HAYES said he would focus on making government smaller and more efficient.

Hunt focuses his campaign on education, welfare reform and deadbeat parents as he champions his administration's successes.

Calling negative campaigning nonproductive, Gov. Jim Hunt encouraged voters to focus on issues rather than mudslinging in a campaign speech Monday in Charlotte.

Hunt used the speech to outline his re-election campaign, pointing to reduced class sizes in elementary schools, increased teachers' salaries and improved safety in schools as strides made in education during his current term.

"The governor has always been dedicated to education," said Dana Pope, press assistant for the Citizens for Jim Hunt Campaign.

"In his first term as governor, he established kindergarten in North Carolina and has always believed in giving children every opportunity to succeed."

Since Hunt took office in 1992, Work First has helped about 17,000 welfare recipients to find work or job training, and the Hunt campaign cited a $36 million decrease in welfare spending as proof of success.

One project has been an effort to identify and apprehend deadbeat parents who may owe as much as $28,000 in unpaid child support. Seventeen of the top 20 offenders have been found, and the program has also been credited with the increased amount of child support collected this year.

Supporting his call for a campaign based on issues rather than negative advertising, Hunt published his 1996 Agenda For Action in which he outlined his plans for North Carolina in the next four years.

Highlighted in his agenda, Hunt has called for increased teacher salaries, and more support for the state university and community college systems. Further actions aimed at curbing domestic violence and juvenile crime, as well as a plan to prepare North Carolina's economy for the 21st century, are also included in Hunt's plan.

In his Monday press conference, Hunt pointed out that voters were not only choosing a governor when they voted on Tuesday, but stressed that they were also making a choice concerning the direction that our state would follow into the future. Hunt said in Charlotte, "If I'm re-elected governor on Tuesday, it will be because North Carolinians are voting for this positive plan and against negative politics."

Gov. JIM HUNT has focused on programs he implemented, such as Smart Start and the crackdown on deadbeat parents.

Gantt tries again to unseat Helms

Gantt wants to reduce taxes on middle-class and working families and will offer tax cuts for education and job training.

Workers from Harvey Gantt's Senate campaign said they were reaching out to middle-class families in an effort to unseat the 24-year incumbent Sen. Jesse Helms.

"Harvey Gantt is the only candidate in this race who has proposed a number of tax deductions for middle-class families," said Gantt's Press Secretary Lisa Mortman.

Gantt supports a $10,000 tax deduction for middle-class families to cover the cost of college tuition and job training, according to Gantt's campaign literature.

Individuals earning up to $90,000 a year and families earning up to $120,000 a year would be eligible for this tax deduction. "Gantt believes kids should not be kept from going to college because of the size of their parents' pocketbooks."

Gantt also supports a $500 per child tax credit for working families for each child under the age of 13. "Gantt believes education is the path to opportunity," Mortman said.

Gantt supports expanding Head Start. Gantt's campaign reports Head Start saves taxpayers $7 for every dollar invested.

According to Gantt's campaign literature, Gantt also supports balancing the budget by cutting subsidies for big corporations instead of cutting Medicare and Social Security.

"Gantt fully supports a balanced budget but not a balanced budget amendment," Mortman said. "Harvey has put forward new ideas and old traditional values."

Democratic Senate candidate HARVEY GANTT has promised to help middle-class families cover college tuition costs.

Jesse Helms wants to reduce the national debt, balance the budget and reduce taxes using a flat tax in his next term as senator.

The mission for the next six years of Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., is to reduce the national debt, Political Director for the Helms campaign Eddie Woodhouse said.

Helms supports a balanced budget amendment to the U.S. Constitution that would force Congress to submit a balanced budget to the president each year, Woodhouse said. Helms also supports a flat tax, he said.

"Helms was the first person to propose a flat tax," said Robert Wilkie, director of the N.C. Republican Party.

Helms authored legislation that would replace the current tax system with a 15 percent flat tax.

"Everybody knows Helms is for reducing taxes," Woodhouse said.

According to a campaign press release, Helms says he opposes any tax increase, including gas tax, tobacco excise tax, Social Security tax and small business tax.

"By reducing the tax burden for working families it makes efforts like paying for college more affordable," Woodhouse said.

Helms' campaign is also focusing on gaining more power for state and local governments.

"(Helms') vision is to bring the decision making process back to people of North Carolina and get it out of the hands of bureaucrats in Washington," Woodhouse said.

Helms has served as senator since 1973.

Sen. JESSE HELMS, R-N.C., said he opposed all forms of tax increases and supports a balanced budget amendment.

For the record

The Nov. 1 article "Carolina Vote Project plans voter mobilization program" should have stated that students who have changed precincts since the last election should go to their original voting site to get a transfer form and should then take that form to the new site. Students can also vote in their old voting precinct.

The Daily Tar Heel regrets the error.
