the University along, and you see where we are now," Hatcher-Wilson said. As a result of efforts by SCALE and Project Literacy, another Campus Y committee, UNC now offers a reading program for employees and the opportunity to take the GED. As the University heads into the 21st century, some wonder what the future holds for the Campus Y. Hatcher-Wilson said she hoped the organization would outlive its usefulness someday, when no racial hatred or poverty existed. She also said she felt that students would be able to keep the Campus Y alive. "One thing that remains current is its emphasis on social justice," Hatcher-Wilson said. "A contemporary organization always responds to current issues of the day, and students in the future will create programs that respond to those issues. "I do know that students have the creativity and the passion to respond to the world around them."

project's budget. "I'm just concerned about the cost of the project," Haggerty said. Haggerty said it was important to remember the development would not be expensive. "This is a small project," he said. "I feel maybe it's getting blown up over its scale." Alderman Alex Zaffron said the project was controversial, but he felt it could be worked out. "I think we're most of the way there," he said.
