in 1,200 students. After the trial played out, students voted on whether the male student was guilty. Sappington said students found the man guilty in a close vote.

Peter Filene, UNC history professor, said evidence of the movement lay in the creation of more courses on masculinity and men's studies, and more conferences, newsletters and journals.

identities and history has been going on for about 15 years. "Like the women's movements, it's a mixture of political ideologies," Filene said. "It's hard to see because people see it about women, but it's happening."

cerning men. "We all live in this world together," Harris said. However, this movement caught on slowly at universities because most college men are concerned with investigating their traditional roles in society, Sappington said.

ing with traditional male notion of what it means to be a man," she said. "They are exaggerating this notion through parodying and risk-taking behavior."

"But after men get to where they think they want to go and look around they say 'wait a minute there's some unsatisfied parts of me,'" Filene said.

Filene said middle-aged men had problems defining who they are and how they relate to others. "(The movement) is men who are asking about the meaning of work, marriage and children in their lives and are also leaning to undo things they were taught as children."
