Faculty Forks Over Funds For Academic Programs

By PATRICIA D. WRIGHT
Staff Writer

The race is on for the University Office of Development to get 20 percent of UNC employees to enforce the "Get in the Picture" theme for the annual University Campaign by donating money toward academic programs.

The University Campaign, started in the early 1990s during the Bicentennial Campaign for Carolina by the Office of Development, was formed to allow UNC employees to pledge money to academic areas.

Before an employee can give to the campaign, he or she must receive donation materials that were sent out during Spring Break, said Speed Hallman, director of Development Communications.

Hallman also said the package of photos of the campus and past donors also included a gift form for employees to donate by check, credit card or payroll deduction.

He said the campaign encouraged employees rather than alumni to pledge because alumni tended to question what the University was doing to help itself.

"When we ask alumni to give, they want to know to what extent the faculty and staff gives before they donate," Hallman said.

"So it is important that others know that the faculty here does support the University."

Hallman said employees often chose to support programs that they worked in or areas that enriched their lives, such as cultural groups or the libraries.

"Sometimes employees give back to any program because the University as a whole has helped them learn and grow."

He said the first University Campaign during the Bicentennial, which spanned from 1989 to 1995, ended with $9.9 million worth of donations.

Minor said that last year, 1,711 employees donated more than $1.3 million toward academic departments.

He said that although he would like to surpass last year's donations, employee participation was more important than how much money was made.

Minor said he could not mention who gave the largest donation to a specific department, but that it was heartwarming to see employees of all levels participate.

"People who conduct classes, keep grounds or fund raise care enough to see that students have the best Carolina experience."

Associate Dean of Students for Judicial Programs Margaret Barrett said that as both an alumnus and an employee, she donated to the University from both aspects.

"From an employee aspect, I feel a sense of community and unity here," she said. "When you know that you are working to better the education of students, you want to give back in any way you can."

Barrett said that since all the needs of the University were not met through legislation, any private donations would help provide the best education programs at the University.

Despite how much money one gave, Hallman said every gift was important.

"It is important that others know how much the University's own faculty and staff supports academics."

Scholarship Runs in Family

By AMY STEPHENS
Staff Writer

Prospective UNC student Jeffrey Black is creating his own family tradition by becoming the second person in his family to receive the Morehead Scholarship.

The Morehead Foundation, created in 1951, announced recipients of the country's oldest non-athletic scholarship March 5. Seventy awards are given yearly to seniors from the U.S., Canada and Great Britain.

This year, 34 N.C. students were chosen for the award. Black was one of two recipients from Mecklenburg County.

Jeffrey's sister, Sherilyn, a sophomore psychology major at UNC, also received the $53,000 scholarship.

Jeffrey, a senior at West Charlotte High School, said his sister did not play a major role in his success with the Morehead. "She offered me her services, and I knew I could talk to her about her experiences but I also knew that our interviews would be different," he said.

Sherilyn said sibling rivalry never really existed in her family. "A lot of other people tried to make this appear like a rivalry but he contributes to so many different kinds of things," she said. "It's just ironic that we have received a lot of the same awards."

Jeffrey said he had been heavily involved in student council at his high school and was currently student body vice president, a position earlier held by Sherilyn.

Despite his high school preparation, Jeffrey said the interviews for the scholarship were challenging. "I definitely wouldn't say they were easy," he said, laughing a little bit. "They got progressively more difficult."

Sherilyn said she thought the scholarship was wonderful and was happy her brother had also received it.

"It offers so many benefits and I have been exposed to a lot of different things," she said. "Last summer, I had the opportunity to work with teenage mothers in San Diego."

Associate Director of the Morehead Foundation Megan Mazzocchi said siblings had won the award in the past.

"We actually have another sister and brother here right now," she said. "It happens every couple years that a sister or brother of one of the recipients goes through the selection process but they don't always receive it."

For the Record

The March 5 article "Skylight to Host Songwriter Contest" should have stated that the N.C. Songwriter's Co-op is a not-for-profit organization.

A March 3 item in University briefs should have identified the Random House Inc. Scholarship as an endowment in memory of Wanda Chappell.

The March 3 article "General Speaks Out on Nuclear Warfare" should have stated that students were protesting sanctions against Iraq.

The Daily Tar Heel regrets the errors.
