chairmen of the BOG Budget and Finance Committee, said the BOG should allow other UNC-system campuses, besides UNC-CH and N.C. State, to increase tuition.

The third aspect of Broad's plan, a $36.8 million state-based financial aid package, was not discussed in detail at the meeting.

President of UNC-CH's Graduate and Professional Student Federation Lee Conner, who attended the meeting, said he worried that the capital fee and tuition increase proposals were not directly linked to the aid proposal.

He said the legislature could feasibly pass the fees and tuition packages without the financial aid package.

But Broad emphasized that her plan was not set in stone and urged board members to suggest changes to her proposal. "I ask you to think about this draft proposal as analogous to the introduction of a piece of legislation.

can't beat something with nothing," he said.

"I plan to really think through some changes and formally present them to the board."

Student activists, who have demonstrated in the past, also claim they are gearing up for next month's vote.

More than 400 students protested the Oct. 28 UNC-CH Board of Trustees meeting where a proposal to increase tuition $1,500 over the next five years was approved.

Students also led a silent protest at the BOG's November meeting, prompting Broad to host a Dec. 2 forum where board members heard students' concerns about the tuition issue.

But student presence at Friday's meeting was much more limited.

Student activist Erica Smiley said students had not lost anything by failing to attend the meeting.

"There was just no reason for us to be there," she said.

But both Smiley and Smith emphasized the importance of student involvement and said students would turn out in February to influence the BOG's vote.

"We think the reason why Molly Broad has, at the very least, proposed a smaller increase is almost entirely due to the actions of students," Smith said.

Students who came to Wilmington said the BOG was eager to hear their perspective.

UNC-CH

Student Body President Nic Heinke said he had spoken with BOG members after Friday's workshop. "I think a lot of it now is personal one-on-one contact with board members."

"I plan to really think through some of the changes and formally present them to the (Board of Governors)."

sive and more efficient campus parking, and a textbook renting system, under which students could rent their books each semester instead of paying the full purchase price.

Junior Matt Martin said he was running to give student government a fresh face. "I have the heart for the everyday issues that students face," he said.

Junior Jamie DeMent has announced plans to run for the post but could not be reached for comment Monday.

Sources have told The Daily Tar Heel that junior Erica Smiley, a member of Student Congress and Alliance for Creating Campus Equity and Seeking Social Justice, also intended to run for the post, but she has not yet made her plans public.

Smiley was very visible in the fall in widespread student protests that erupted as UNC passed a proposal calling for a significant boost in tuition.

Three candidates have announced bids for Carolina Athletic Association president. Junior Tee Pruitt, CAA's president, announced plans to run for a second term. "It's an awesome opportunity," he said. "Most of the time we only have a year to make things happen."

Junior Corey Bell, a UNC wrestler, has also declared his intent to run for the post. Bell said his athletic experience made him qualified for the job.

Sophomore Michael Songer and Junior Adam Walters announced plans Monday to run for CAA co-presidents, citing a need for increased school spirit at all UNC sporting events.

Only one student has come public with plans to run for Residence Hall Association president.

Junior Gaffney Gunter, who serves as RHA's current social chairman, said his experience with the organization made him qualified for the post. No candidates have yet announced their intent to run for the posts of Graduate and Professional Student Federation president or senior class president.

whites?" said Professor Jeff Jones of the Department of History.

"My answer is institutional racism, which is rooted in a long history of slavery and racism."

Neil Pedersen, superintendent of Chapel Hill-Carrboro City Schools, said the rally helped strengthen the fight against minority problems in community schools. The system has traditionally been considered the strongest in the state.

"The institutions and the people who work for them are very aware of these issues and are working diligently on improving conditions," Pedersen said. "A rally like this raises the awareness of the importance of being successful in this effort."

The East Chapel Hill High School step team, consisting of both male and female black students, rewarded the audience with a short show at the end of the rally.

In the worship service following the rally and march, the crowd had the opportunity to warm up while they heard Alderman Joal Hall Brown speak on the importance of achieving a well-rounded education.

Brown's statements were answered with "amens" from the congregation, signaling their approval of her ideas and statements.

"If we want our children to succeed, they must possess character," she said. "If we instill in them character, they will be able to handle any circumstances they encounter."

"They will be able to persevere when times look dark."
